Mr. PAYNE. I can not. Unlike the gentleman, this is the first time I have spoken on this subject. You say it benefits the city of New York and the city of Buffalo. It does in a way; it helps the farmers of my State in getting the products cheaper into the city of New York, for we find the rates on the railroads are reduced because of the existence of that canal. But you want to remember that from Buffalo the wheat that comes from your State and every bushel of corn that comes from your State and every head of cattle that comes from your State into the East reaches those markets at a cheaper tariff because the State of New York has built that magnificent canal, which now, when completed, will have a draft of 12 feet of water. Now, you higgle and haggle here over a little amount of charge that you may give to the people of the Pacific coast, if you please, because interstate commerce is to go through the Panama Canal. You talk about the price in extravagant terms that it will cost to run this canal. I understand the total cost of operation and sanitation will not exceed $4,000,000, and with the estimate of commerce to go through this canal, in excess of 10,000,000 tons at $1.25 a ton, the entire expense will be paid twice over if you allowed every pound of freight coming from the Pacific coast to go through free. The fathers, when the Constitution was formed, contemplated that no tribute should be paid on anything coming from one State to another. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, as my distinguished colleague from Auburn, N. Y., has based his argument upon the Erie Canal, I take the liberty of stating the exact facts about the Erie Canal, and will draw a conclusion which clearly differentiates it in principle from the Panama Canal. [Applause.] The Erie Canal was opened up to navigation in 1826, before the New York Central had gotten started, in order to help move traffic from one end of the State to the other. Very soon after that the New York Central Railroad began to develop, first by owning several small railroads—one was the Utica & Syracuse, another 50 miles long—and after awhile the great Cornelius Vanderbilt took it up and connected it into one line, called the New York Central. And then, after they got one line established, the New York Central built two tracks, and then three tracks, and then four tracks.

Mr. PAYNE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Well, I have but five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Just for one question. I would like to know why they built the Erie Canal to the city of Buffalo and made an entrance into Lake Erie?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. That is not material. I want to state the facts. After awhile, after the four tracks on the New York Central, the West Shore was laid parallel with the canal—parallel with the Central—so that two lines of tracks and the canal went from one end of the State to the other, and were confined to a zone not wider than a mile. Now, the New York Central by degrees developed its business, until it reduced the cost of carrying freight and cut into the canal business so that the boatmen could not pay the tolls and live. My friend does not say that from the time the canal was started in 1826 until 1883 it paid tolls all the time. [Applause.]

He leaves that out. It paid tolls until the time came when by this fierce competition they could not pay tolls any longer. Then, in 1883, the tolls were taken off and the canal was made free. Now, where is the similarity? Why, this canal furnishes such a benefit to coastwise ships through it that they could pay $6 a ton for their freight going through and make more money than they are making now. They do not need it. They can make all the money they want to and they do. The toll is negligible. They all admit that these ships can drive the railroads out of the traffic from coast to coast if they wish to do it. We do not need to help them. They want this subsidy, and I repeat it for the gentleman from Wisconsin, it is a subsidy and an appeal to the American flag in order to prejudice people in favor of this graft. [Applause.] The American people who built this canal with American money and American genius and American enterprise should have a little benefit of it. I say the people generally should have a little of that benefit and that less than 1 per cent of them, who are greedy and selfish beyond description, should not have it all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is recognized, according to the agreement, for 20 minutes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, I purpose to discuss the proposition submitted to the House by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] without in any wise attempting to decry those gentlemen who do not agree with me upon this proposition.

I should like to make the statement on this proposition as fairly as I am able to make it, and in order that I may do so I desire to read just a few words from the original proposition regarding the toll matter as is included in the bill now under consideration, and the amendment submitted by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], adopted by the House committee a while ago:

No preference—

Says the bill—

shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or its subjects, other than vessels—

And so forth.

The amendment adopted reads:

The rate of toll shall be uniform upon all vessels excepting the official vessels of the Government of the United States.

And so forth.

Now, primarily, the difference between the propositions submitted by the majority of the committee and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] is simply a difference as to whether there shall be any tolls imposed upon vessels doing the coastwise business of this country, which, of course, is entirely in American vessels, and vessels traveling through the canal belonging to all of the nations of the world, including American vessels engaged in foreign trade. The first objection to the proposition embodied in the bill, which is not at all cured by the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, adopted by the committee this afternoon, is to this effect, that vessels engaged in coastwise trade, all of which are exclusively American vessels, should be enabled under this law to go through the canal without having tolls imposed upon them. And the proposition embodied in the original words of the proposition in the bill and the amendment as adopted by the House contemplates that vessels engaged in coastwise trade shall also bear the tax or toll imposed upon other vessels going through the canal. Now, the proposition originally included in the bill, as well as the amendment adopted by the House to-day, is, in fact, an interpretation of the treaty under which we were permitted to build this canal.

In my opinion foreign nations have no concern whatever, so far as our coastwise navigation laws are concerned, in what enactment may be made by this Congress relating to coastwise trade, whether that trade goes through the canal or otherwise, because no foreign vessel is permitted to engage in our coastwise trade. Only American vessels are permitted to engage in that business, and I do not see how it is possible for anyone to construe the fact that we propose to permit vessels in which no foreign nation has any interest whatever, in which they never have had any interest since the enactment of the coastwise navigation laws of this country. I do not see how any of these nations can possibly be interested in any legislation which may be enacted by this or any future Congress, so long as these laws are extant upon the statute books.

But the interpretation is, that by the proposition in the bill and by the amendment adopted to-day it would in the end foreclose us from giving any preference to any vessel engaged in the coastwise trade or any American vessel engaged in commerce upon any sea of the world. And it does not make a particle of difference that this amendment was intended that we should not be held to have construed the treaty.

The fact remains that, no matter at what time we may determine otherwise hereafter, if the committee's idea shall prevail in this bill, we may undertake to relinquish the right of this Government to collect tolls upon American vessels, whether engaged in coastwise or foreign trade, the nations competing with us in the carrying of foreign trade hereafter will hold that this forecloses us in rebating in behalf of our own shipping to vessels going through the canal. And I hold, if this proposition is carried in the bill, not only will it not permit us to decide for ourselves as to our own shipping along the coast in which no foreign nation can take part, but foreign nations will quote this as an acknowledgment on the part of the American people that we have no right to rebate the tolls that may be collected upon vessels that may be engaged in coastwise or foreign shipping.

Now, if there is any doubt as to whether we have a right to remit tolls—and I shall not speak of subsidies at this time, because I propose to deal with that subject a little later—but if there is any doubt as to whether we have the right, in so far as coastwise traffic is concerned, to rebate in favor of traffic going through the canal, I may quote a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to charges on vessels entering the ports of this country.

Some years ago a treaty was made between this country and England by which it was stipulated that British vessels entering the ports in this country should not be charged any more for that privilege than should be charged for American vessels engaged in the same trade.

A statute was passed by Congress and a law was enacted by the State of Texas, and when a British vessel entered the port of Galveston the port authorities, acting both by virtue of the law enacted by Congress and of the law enacted by the State of Texas, charged pilotage upon an English vessel, pilotage which had not been charged upon an American vessel. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., p. 332), quoted in part in the report of the minority, decided, through Chief Justice White, then an associate justice on the bench of the Supreme Court, that the coastwise business of the United States was of no concern to the vessels of foreign nations engaged in business in this country, and that in this case the laws of Texas and the laws of the United States put a legitimate burden upon them despite the treaty between the United States and England, which could not affect their traffic, and that this warranted the authorities of our country in excluding from the operation of the United States laws and the Texas statutes the charges upon vessels of the United States not only on those engaged in coastwise traffic, but as well those engaged in world-wide traffic.

The Supreme Court of the United States maintained that doctrine, so that I do not see how it is possible for anyone to contend that there is ground of complaint because a foreign vessel going through the canal carrying traffic which it can not take up in any port of the United States for delivery in any other port of the United States, is treated in a way different from the way in which our coastwise vessels are treated.

I do not see how it can be claimed that these have a just ground for complaint. The owner of such a foreign vessel can not complain that he is being discriminated against in favor of a vessel the character of traffic from which he is already excluded by law and from which it is excluded at this time of the cutting of the canal. The fact that an American vessel doing business between ports in the different States of the Union and doing business that is purely interstate is receiving a preference can not be the basis of complaint on the part of any vessel not permitted by law to participate in such commerce.

So far as I am concerned, I am in favor of allowing every vessel flying the United States flag to go through the canal without paying any tolls at all. I stand upon that proposition.

But we who have been opposed to any tolls upon vessels doing a coastwise business have felt that the argument which has been ingeniously presented upon this floor to the effect that there is a discrimination that violates the treaty between England and this country might prevail if we extended the benefits of this exclusion—not subsidy—to American vessels engaged in the foreign trade, and that it might possibly by such argument bring us into complications with foreign nations at the very moment of opening the canal. We have been anxious that there shall be no complication when the canal is opened, in order that we might invite the trade of the world to go through that canal, instead of having controversies through the State Department of this Government with foreign nations engaged in foreign trade going also through the canal.

Now, I can not see how anyone can claim that there is a discrimination because of the fact that that traffic from which all nations of the world are excluded is given preference over traffic in which all other nations are permitted to participate. Why should any nation claim that it is being deprived of rights which it possessed because of the fact that vessels engaged in traffic between the States, in which they are not permitted to engage at all, shall have preference, in so far as tolls are concerned, over vessels engaged in an entirely different business, with which there can be no competition and as to which there is absolute prohibition.

Now, I understand from the debate that has occurred on this floor that gentlemen are arguing that we ought to impose tolls upon American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, because we need the money. That is not borne out by the testimony before the committee. The testimony is this, that according to the estimation of Prof. Johnson, in whom everybody who knows anything about the subject has great confidence, the canal will carry, in the first year, a tonnage of over ten and one-half million tons, and of that tonnage only 1,600,000 tons will consist of coastwise traffic. The estimate of Col. Geothals is to the effect that the cost of maintaining the Canal will be only $4,000,000 a year, and that with the profits accruing to us by virtue of the fact that under this bill coaling stations, and so forth, will be operated by the Government, this cost will be reduced to $3,500,000. It is estimated that with a toll of $1 a ton a revenue of over $9,000,000 would be derived with which to operate the canal. If you exclude the coastwise trade you would still have $8,500,000, with which to pay an expenditure of $3,500,000.

Now, where is the necessity of putting on this toll? And yet gentlemen who are opposed to the granting of free passage to American ships engaged in the coastwise traffic assert that the failure to tax coastwise traffic is a subsidy. I will tell you where the subsidy is. The subsidy is not in favor of American vessels that will pass through the canals, but the subsidy is to the railroads. [Applause.] Do not talk to me about subsidies. Why, to carry the argument to a logical conclusion of the gentlemen who claim it as a subsidy to the vessels, suppose we should put a tax of $10 a ton on every vessel in the coastwise trade going through the canal, there would not be a ton go through, but the railroads would charge the American consumer every cent of the $10 in the transportation of freight and in supplying the demands of those who live on the coast just as they would those living in the interior of the country. Why, gentlemen, the subsidy is for the railroads. We put in the bill a maximum of $1.25 a ton. Everybody admits that the tax will only be a dollar in order to permit this canal to compete with the Suez Canal. Will anyone say, as the President has declared for $1 a ton, that the 25 cents not charged is a subsidy, or will it be construed as a remission of authorized charges?

The subsidy is for the railroad. No man came before the committee asking for the imposition of a tax on the steamship companies except the men who were engaged in railroad business carrying freight from coast to coast. [Applause.] The charge of tolls is the subsidy to the railroads, and those who talk of subsidy had better look to it. The American people are wise to it, and if you look at resolutions adopted in every commercial body, not only on the coast, but in the inland cities of the country, you will find that there is no one interested in these tolls but the transcontinental railroad companies. Every dollar that you add to the tax of a ton of freight that crosses through the canal enables the railroads to add the tax on a similar ton of freight in carrying it across the continent or in delivering it in the interior of the country.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that most of the coastwise vessels are owned by the railroads?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes; probably so. But will the gentleman vote with me to exclude from the use of the canal every steamship owned in whole or in part by a railroad?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the gentleman stand with the American people or stand by the railroads?

Mr. SABATH. But the gentleman maintains that we are aiding the railroads by placing a tax on the vessels that are owned by the railroads. I can not understand his argument.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let me read the gentleman a proposition in regard to section 11. Perhaps this will clear his understanding. It is my purpose, when we reach section 11, to offer an amendment, a part of which reads as follows:

> That from and after the opening of the Panama Canal no ship engaged in interstate commerce which is owned, leased, controlled, or operated by any person, firm, association, or corporation engaged in any agreement, combination, ship ring or conference with reference to rates, ports, routes of traffic, rebates, or terminal facilities shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade through said canal, and it shall be the duty of the President to exclude every such ship of commerce from the canal.

Will the gentleman from Illinois vote for that?

Mr. SABATH. I have voted for that proposition and shall continue to vote for it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois say that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if we use 10 minutes more we shall have been on section 5 three hours, which is more time than the gentleman from Louisiana and I agreed to take. I move to close debate in 10 minutes, and I think it is fair that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] should have that 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia can move to close debate in 10 minutes, but he can not allot the time. Under the rule it would have to be divided equally.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on this section and amendments in 10 minutes. As I say, I think it fair that the gentleman from Minnesota should have that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves to close debate on this section in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it is one of the amusing features of this debate to notice the agony of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] in opposition to the terrible railroads. It is the first spasm that the members of the committee have noticed, so far, since his service on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. When you compare the records of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], and the other majority members of that committee, I think no further argument is necessary on that proposition, or to answer the thunderings against the transcontinental railroads, which here so often are the bogie men to terrify the faint-hearted and gloss the sins of those who know what they are here for.

But there is a little matter, before I enter on the main proposition, that I wish to speak of. On page 2 of the Doremus amendment you will notice these words, in line 3, speaking of the tolls, "other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens"; describing those who will have the use of the canal, "use of the United States and its citizens." Do you know that under that language all foreign lines in the world owned by our citizens could be sent through the canal free of tolls, including that of the International Mercantile Marine, the Red Star Line, the United Fruit Co., with its 76 vessels under a foreign flag yet owned by our citizens? Under the Doremus amendment and that language all of those could be sent through the canal. I do not know whether they intended that or not, but that is the fact, and that is a joker which is cunningly hidden in the recesses of this remarkable amendment.

Mr. MANN. Of course that is not the fact.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. As my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] has so clearly pointed out, the coastwise trade is a monopoly now to our own vessels, and has had a monopoly for nearly 100 years, and by this amendment you discriminate in favor of the trade which has the monopoly and against the foreign trade, that greatly needs help if any industry in the world needs it. Our foreign navigation really needs our assistance, yet none is contemplated here.

Do you realize that the amendment to section 11, which the gentleman is so much in favor of, excludes railroad-owned ships from the use of the canal, and this takes away one of the principal classes of competitors in the coastwise business? The committee should know that we not only give this coastwise shipping a monopoly, but we exclude from such monopoly all railroad ships, thereby giving those who are left not only a monopoly, but a greatly restricted monopoly, by excluding all this strong competition. We give those who are left, a small class, a restricted monopoly, a privilege granted to but few industries in the world. What more do we do? Under the long-and-short-haul section of the interstate-commerce law, as construed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, there will gradually be a system of distance tariffs in this country, and the railroads will be excluded from a very large part of the transcontinental business necessarily, because they can not meet and will not be allowed to meet the canal water rates. Such business will be necessarily thrown upon the canal traffic. The ships using the canal will be obliged to carry that great increase of business thrust upon them. Remember, those ships already have a monopoly, and, in addition, there is excluded a large part of the competition from that monopoly, and then the law in addition will compel a large part of the commerce from coast to coast in this country to use the ships through the canal. We compel that business to seek those ships. No business in the world will have so many favors thrown at it as the coastwise business of the country through the canal. No special interest will be so directly favored by law as this special and favored interest of the coastwise trade.

Next, the testimony shows that these steamship lines—there are practically only two or three—monopolize the business in their spheres. The Atlantic coastwise lines do and will monopolize that business along the Atlantic coast and exclude all competition. The line through the Panama Canal, with their big fleet of ships, will exclude competition exactly as they do now. They have the money, they have the connections, they have the terminals, they have the prestige, and they can easily cut out all competitors, because there is no regulation of them or for them provided by this bill. There is no system of minimum rates; no supervision by the Interstate Commerce Commission. So they can pursue any kind of cutthroat practice for the sake of killing competition and securing this rich field for themselves. The very moment any ordinary competition comes they can and will drop their rates and wipe from the seas any possible competition. And why? The testimony also shows that these same gentlemen who get the benefit of this amendment meet the representatives of railroad companies every time there is a meeting to fix transcontinental rates. Mr. Jackson, of the American-Hawaiian Line, and representatives of the Atlantic coastwise lines meet with the representatives of the transcontinental lines and fix their steamship rates about 20 per cent below the railroad rates—just enough to get what business they want without disturbing any of the transcontinental rates. If you pass the Doremus substitute, you will give them an opportunity to fix their rates, pocket these tolls, and enable them to catch the increase of business and eliminate competition by the failure to regulate them. Yet the plea these gentlemen make for the American merchant marine and for these lines and this system which will completely eliminate and wipe out all business competition and have a restricted monopoly on the sea and follow the railroad rates without reducing them appreciably to the people. That is the crowd you gentlemen are trying to help by free tolls.

Another thing you do is this: You give them free tolls in this same section 5—pay no share of the expenses—and provide they shall have the right to have damages if they are injured under this very section. We pass them through free. We pay the expense of free passage, and yet if they are injured in any way this very section prepares for damages for those very paupers. In every other waterway of the United States they would be obliged to come here for any claims, but you provide here in advance for rewarding and encouraging claims in addition to your subsidy of free tolls. There never has been anything like it in the history of the country. The testimony showed that the tolls on this coastwise trade would be inconsequential, perhaps from 2 to 3 cents a hundred, from 40 to 60 cents a ton. Not one single witness dared to state that that toll would be sufficient to build one single American ship—not one. Not one ship would be constructed on account of free tolls. It would simply be a big bonus to an already bloated and pampered monopoly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the criticism which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] made in regard to vessels of the United States and its citizens. That provision gives to the President the power to grant preferential tolls to American vessels flying the American flag in foreign commerce, in addition to the free tolls granted by the Doremus amendment to the coastwise trade, and that provision as it reads in the bill was prepared by the President of the United States, O. K'd by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of State, introduced by me into the House, and now for the first time has met any criticism. It is not subject to the criticism which the gentleman makes, and would not provide for free tolls for any foreign vessels or any vessels flying a foreign flag. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there has been considerable feeling shown in the debate upon this subject, and I have heard gentlemen on one side talk about gentlemen upon the other side being in favor of subsidies and being under control of subsidists, and on the other side gentlemen being controlled by railroad interests. I never have voted myself for a ship subsidy, though perhaps that is a fault rather than a virtue in the minds of many of the gentlemen who have now been urging that this proposition was in the interest of ship subsidy; but if it comes to the question whether we shall decide in this House as between granting the ocean free to the American merchant marine as against the transcontinental railroads and their interests, I am in favor of a free ocean. [Applause.] Everyone knows that the great object which will be attained by the construction of the Panama Canal, if it shall be attained at all, is its effect upon railroad rates in the United States. For every ton of freight that goes through the canal and directly comes under the question of tolls, there will be a hundred or a thousand tons crossing the continent on the railways, and the rate of freight on the railroads will be controlled not only in the transcontinental shipments, but in the intermediate shipments by the rates upon the ship lines passing between New York and Portland, and no one can deny it. [Applause.] It is to the interest of the inland part of the country as well as the coastwise part of the country that we help to control and regulate these freight rates. We may pass laws about interstate commerce commissions and may confer authority as we please, but there is no power so potent in the control of railway rates as rival water lines. [Applause.] And when we construct the Panama Canal and provide in effect the rate of freight between the two oceans we will have determined for all time a regulator of railroad rates in the United States, the beneficial effect of which will go into every hamlet, every village, every city, every home in the land. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD) there were—ayes 24, noes 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULZER. I wish to ask if an amendment to the substitute is now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. SULZER. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the substitute of Mr. DOREMUS to section 5 by striking out of line 5, page 1, the words "engaged in the coastwise trade" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "flying the flag"; and on page 2, after the word "less," line 2, strike out the words "other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "trade," in line 5, page 1, of the Doremus amendment, the words "and vessels of the United States registered in the foreign trade."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. Let the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted——

Mr. CANNON. I do not want to debate, but we failed to catch the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. CANNON. How would it read then?

Mr. JONES. It would read, "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and vessels of the United States registered in the foreign trade." It is so as to include foreign trade.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the Doremus substitute.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the Chair was in doubt.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 91.

Mr. DOREMUS and Mr. MANN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers [Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. DOREMUS] reported that there were—ayes 100, noes 90.

The CHAIRMAN. On this proposition the ayes are 100 and the noes are 90, and the substitute is agreed to. [Applause.] The Clerk will read section 11.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"From and after the 1st day of July, 1913, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

That section 6 of said act to regulate commerce, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"Within three months after the taking effect of this act any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce which, alone or in connection with any other common carrier, transports passengers or property in connection with a water carrier to or from a foreign country from or to any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia and makes or participates in joint through rates for such transportation shall, upon the request of any water carrier engaged in the lake, river, or coastwise trade of the United States, including trade through the Panama Canal, provide like port facilities, connections, and joint through rates from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia for and in connection with such water carrier; and the charge for such share of such joint through rate shall be no greater sum of money than such common carrier alone, or in connection with any other common carrier, receives for the same service for transportation of passengers or property in connection with any water carrier to or from a foreign country from or to any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. ADAMSON. This is unanimously reported by the committee.

Amend section 11 by striking out all of the section after the word "that" in line 9, page 15, and insert the following:

"SEC. 11. That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"'From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.'

"Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section and pray for an order permitting the continuanace of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph. The commission may on its own motion or the application of any shipper institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.

"That section 6 of said act to regulate commerce, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"'When property may be or is transported from point to point in the United States by rail and water through the Panama Canal or otherwise, the transportation being by a common carrier or carriers, and not entirely within the limits of a single State, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have jurisdiction of such transportation and of the carriers, both by rail and by water, which may or do engage in the same, in the following particulars, in addition to the jurisdiction given by the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910:

"(a) To establish physical connection between the lines of the rail carrier and the dock of the water carrier by directing the rail carrier to make suitable connection between its line and a track or tracks which have been constructed from the dock to the limits of its right of way, or by directing either or both the rail and water carrier, individually or in connection with one another, to construct and connect with the lines of the rail carrier a spur track or tracks to the dock. This provision shall only apply where such connection is reasonably practicable, can be made with safety to the public, and where the amount of business to be handled is sufficient to justify the outlay.

"The commission shall have full authority to determine the terms and conditions upon which these connecting tracks, when constructed, shall be operated, and it may, either in the construction or the operation of such tracks, determine what sum shall be paid to or by either carrier. The provisions of this paragraph shall extend to cases where the dock is owned by other parties than the carrier involved.

"(b) To establish through routes and maximum joint rates between and over such rail and water lines, and to determine all the terms and conditions under which such lines shall be operated in the handling of the traffic embraced.

"(c) To establish maximum proportional rates by rail to and from the ports to which the traffic is brought, or from which it is taken by the water carrier, and to determine to what traffic and in connection with what vessels and upon what terms and conditions such rates shall apply. By proportional rates are meant those which differ from the corresponding local rates to and from the port and which apply only to traffic which has been brought to the port or is carried from the port by a common carrier by water.

"(d) If any rail carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce enters into arrangements with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, for the handling of through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Interstate Commerce Commission may require such railway to enter into similar arrangements with any or all other lines of steamships operating from said port to the same foreign country."

The orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to this section shall only be made upon formal complaint or in proceedings instituted by the commission of its own motion and after full hearing. The orders provided for in the two amendments to the act to regulate commerce enacted in this section shall be served in the same manner and enforced by the same penalties and proceedings as are the orders of the commission made under the provisions of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910, and they may be conditioned for the payment of any sum or the giving of security for the payment of any sum or the discharge of any obligation which may be required by the terms of said order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill and is not germane to the section to which it is offered as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois be kind enough to state his point of order again?

Mr. MANN. The bill, which is "A bill to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," contains section 11, which is a section to amend two sections of the interstate-commerce law. Section 11 in the bill is, of course, itself not germane to the bill, but that section is in the bill. That section proposes to amend section 5 of an act to regulate commerce by making certain additions to section 5 as a new paragraph in reference to the ownership of railways or common carriers of water lines and stops there. The amendment which is now offered proposes in addition to that to confer certain authority upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact, authorizing the commission to institute proceedings, authorizing the commission to make certain determinations. Now, section 11 of the bill, although contained in the bill, and although having no relation to the subject matter of the bill, may be in order because it is in the original; but, certainly, when it comes to amending that, gentlemen can not go beyond the scope of the provisions in the original bill. No part of this matter relates to the subject matter of the bill and the general purpose of the bill, and when gentlemen seek to amend section 11 it seems to me they must confine themselves to matters relating to the subject matter of section 11. It does not in any way relate to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to any powers conferred upon that commission. The amendment proposes to confer power upon the commission, to authorize the commission to institute proceedings, a matter which is not in the bill at all, and I think where the gentleman introduces a bill and injects foreign matters into it that when it comes to amending the bill it ought to be confined to the provisions of the bill and not allowed to wander over the entire face of the earth.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think a lot of gentlemen over here did not distinctly understand the gentleman from Illinois, and I wish to inquire to what provisions of the substitute to section 11 does he object.

Mr. MANN. I am not objecting to anything; I make the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, for information I would like to know what the gentleman makes his point of order on.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is made that the substitute offered by the committee is not germane to section 11 in the bill, and in addition the point of order is made that section 11 in the bill is not germane to the general scope of the bill, but since it is in the bill it is in order. The Chairman will notice that section 11 in the bill contains the substance of the provision which was contained in the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois himself excluding railroad-owned ships from the canal.

Mr. MANN. My bill did not propose that at all.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The general subject of section 11 is the use of the canal by a certain class of railroad-owned ships. The general subject in the amendment and in the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois was identically that same thing, regulating the use of the canal by railroad-owned ships, so that if it be admitted that a bill regulating the use of the Panama Canal can regulate its use by a certain class of vessels, like railroad-owned ships, then section 11 is clearly within the scope of this bill to regulate how the canal shall be used, how it shall be used to promote the commerce of this country, or how it shall be used to prevent any disadvantage to the commerce of the country, and so it is within the general scope of the legislation sought.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What provision is there in the bill amending section 5 of the interstate-commerce act that relates in any way whatever to the Panama Canal?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will wait, I am getting to that rapidly.

Now, if it be admitted that the general scope of the legislation is such that this bill has a right to regulate how the canal may be used, what classes of vessels it is desirable to exclude, what classes of vessels it is desirable to include, then, as I said, section 11 is in order. Now, if section 11 is in order, it is in order to make it conform to existing law of the United States with reference to the subject of interstate commerce.

Now, it is known by everybody—as a matter of fact, it is of common knowledge, and the Chairman and the Members must take notice of such fact—that a great many of the railroad companies of the United States own water lines used in connection and in competition with themselves as a part of the business of transportation. That is a matter of common knowledge of which the Chair is bound to know and we are bound to know. The Chair will know also that under the law as it exists, that whenever one of those water lines makes a through rate or traffic connection with a railroad that water line comes under the operations of the interstate-commerce law and within the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, the first part of the committee amendment does exactly the same thing. It provides in substance that a water carrier, one of the water carriers that is owned by a common carrier, subject to the interstate law, is brought within the operation and in the use of the canal itself. It is known, and the testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and laid before this House shows, that one of the prominent classes of vessels which will use this canal is composed of those that are owned by railroads under the control and operation of the interstate-commerce law; and those water carriers come under the operation of that law.

Now, this amendment does just this and no more. It attempts to control, to regulate, to bring within the terms of the existing law, those water carriers which use the Panama Canal. Now, in controlling those water carriers it was deemed advisable and necessary by the committee that in controlling those which use the Panama Canal at the same time to include the water carriers which would come within that general class elsewhere in the country. In other words, the language of the first part of the committee amendment covers the water carriers using the Panama Canal and all other water carriers of the same class elsewhere engaged in interstate commerce. That class of carriers using the canal is within the scope of that language and so within the scope of the bill, and, being within the scope of the bill, is entirely germane to it.

The gentleman speaks about conferring powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. We do not, in fact, and properly, confer any new power upon the commission. The law provides in substance that vessels owned by railroads competing with themselves in interstate commerce are excluded from the use of the canal. That is the substance of the first part of that amendment. How shall that question of fact be determined as to whether or not a vessel owned by a railroad line is, as a matter of fact, competing with itself in interstate commerce. It is a question of fact that has to be determined some way. The bill, in order to prevent confusion, ought to prescribe how that question of fact ought to be determined, and so the language of this amendment itself does prescribe that that question of fact shall be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Suppose we had decided that question of fact should be determined by the governor of the canal, nobody can doubt that that would be germane now, would doubt that would be entirely proper, but instead of that we preferred to put the determination of the question of fact with that official body which knows the most about the subject, which could determine it the easiest and fairest and quickest and have the means at command to determine. So, instead of providing for the determination of that question of fact by the governor of the canal, we provide that it should be done by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that this amendment is germane to section 11, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think we are all tired of oratory, and, therefore, I move that all debate on this substitute and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Make it five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit, the Chair will state that there are two or three amendments to be offered first, and if they are disposed of there will be no trouble.

Mr. JONES. I would suggest 30 minutes. Gentlemen want to get home, but this other section was debated for three hours, and this section 11 is of more importance.

Mr. BURLESON. Make it five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will suggest 25 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a question before the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on section 11 in 25 minutes. Of course, I do not want to cut off any amendments.

Mr. BURLESON. Make it 20 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let them have 25 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Let them have 20 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Let them have the whole day.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will change the time of my motion to 25 minutes on the——

Mr. SHERLEY. I hardly think that motion is in order. We have had some debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, then I ask unanimous consent that after 25 minutes of debate we vote on the section and amendments thereto.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understood this morning in the committee that we should get about 40 minutes on a side on section 11.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman think he needs that much? I think everybody understands it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think we do.

Mr. ADAMSON. How about 20 minutes on a side?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Forty minutes on a side. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. MANN. Make it 20 minutes on a side, not to include the time taken in voting.

Mr. ADAMSON. All right; make it 20 minutes on a side.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how this time is going to be controlled.

Mr. JONES. I would like to know what is meant by 20 minutes on a side. I have an amendment that I would like to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments that may be offered thereto shall be limited to 40 minutes—eight five-minute speeches.

Mr. JONES. If I can have an understanding that I can have five minutes, I will not object.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the advocates of the bill can have half of the time, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BROUSSARD offers the following amendment to the substitute offered by Mr. ADAMSON:

Page 1, strike out lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and in line 7, before the word "from," insert "section 11." Same page, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "the 1st day of July, 1914," and insert in lieu thereof the words "opening of the Panama Canal."

Same page, lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, strike out the words "with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense," and insert in lieu thereof "engaged in interstate commerce through the Panama Canal, and it shall be the duty of the President to exclude any such ship of commerce from the canal."

Same page, strike out lines 18, 19, and 20, also all of page 2, all of page 3, all of page 4, and all of page 5, and in lieu thereof insert:

"That from and after the opening of the Panama Canal no ship engaged in interstate commerce which is owned, leased, controlled, or operated by any person, firm, association, or corporation engaged in any agreement, combination, ship ring, or conference with reference to rates, ports, routes of traffic, rebates, or terminal facilities, shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade through said canal, and it shall be the duty of the President to exclude every such ship of commerce from the canal.

"That any officer or agent of any railroad company or corporation, or any officer or agent of any ship or shipping company, or any other person whatsoever, who is a party to any violation of this section, or who knowingly violates or who permits any violation thereto, shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $10,000 or less than $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court having jurisdiction thereof."

So as to make the section read as follows:

"SEC. 11. From and after the opening of the Panama Canal it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever, by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner, in any common carrier by water engaged in interstate commerce through the Panama Canal. And it shall be the duty of the President to exclude any such ship of commerce from the canal.

"That from and after the opening of the Panama Canal no ship engaged in interstate commerce which is owned, leased, controlled, or operated by any person, firm, association, or corporation engaged in any agreement, combination, ship ring, or conference with reference to rates, ports, routes of traffic, rebates, or terminal facilities shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade through said canal, and it shall be the duty of the President to exclude every such ship of commerce from the canal.

"That any officer or agent of any railroad company or corporation or any officer or agent of any ship or shipping company or any other person whatsoever who is a party to any violation of this section or who knowingly violates or who permits any violation thereto shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $10,000 or less than $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court having jurisdiction thereof."

Mr. ADAMSON. Who offers the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. ADAMSON. I thought he offered a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is recognized.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, the first objection to the proposition submitted by the committee as a substitute for the provision in the bill is that the substitute proposes to legislate an amendment into the interstate-commerce act. I do not believe that we ought to engage in legislation by indirection. If the interstate-commerce act requires amendment, a bill ought to be brought for that purpose upon the floor and discussed upon its own merits.

The second objection to it is that gentlemen who have opposed free tolls through the canal have contended that our section 5 was the granting of a subsidy to the steamship combines engaged in the coastwise trade.

This amendment contemplates the exclusion of any steamships from the canal owned in whole or in part by any railroad and the exclusion from the canal of any steamships engaged in any combine of any kind whatsoever with the object to charge additional freight upon traffic. It is intended by this amendment to the substitute to make this canal the canal of the American people and not the canal of combines by railroads or by steamships anywhere in this country.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have but five minutes, and I regret I can not yield.

It is intended by this provision to make this canal a canal of the American people until at least it is proven that the American people can not manage the canal with interest to themselves, and when the time shall come that the canal can not be operated in the interest of the American people, then it will be time enough for us to give it to the railroads, or give it to the steamship combines, or give it to somebody else who can manage it in their interest and maintain its integrity as it was intended when we undertook the construction of it.

But, so far as I am concerned by this resolution, I want to emphasize the fact that those of us who at least have been opposed to putting tolls upon commerce between the States carried by ships going through the canal, delivering freight from one State to another, insist that it shall not be carried by any combination that shall tend to increase the freight rates upon traffic. I want the ship that leaves San Francisco or New Orleans, upon which we have remitted the toll charge, not to be in combination with other lines of steamships engaged in the same trade, and not to be in the control of railroads interested in competing with these steamships in order to suppress independent lines engaged in the same business.

I believe that this canal ought to be managed, in view of the large expenditure which it has entailed, in the interest of all the people. It should not be managed with a view to conferring favor and profit upon railroad companies, whose business it is to carry freight upon land and not upon water, and it ought not to be managed in behalf of any combination of steamship lines engaged in competition with the railroads; but it should be, as we intended it to be, a water route to compete with every railroad carrying freight from the Atlantic to the Pacific, reacting in its charges upon every section of the country lying between the two great ranges of mountains on either side of this Continent.

This proposition is simply to prevent steamships engaged in supposed competition with railroads, owned by the railroads themselves, to exclude competition from independent lines that might engage in the traffic along the coast of this country. It is intended further to prevent steamship companies engaging in combinations by which they can increase the freight rates either in their own interest by combination, or in the interest of railroads that they are supposed to compete with after the opening of the canal. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry, or, rather, a question. Is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana offered for the first time, or is it in print?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is not in print.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to favor the amendment to the bill before us, offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and to protest against the passage of the act with section 11 as the committee desire to amend it. I wish particularly to call the attention of the House to what will be accomplished should the bill as amended by the committee become a law.

The title of this bill is "A bill to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," yet under the bill as the committee proposes to amend it we would add an amendment to the interstate-commerce act which would affect not only vessels going through the canal, but affect the shipping and transportation facilities of a large section of the United States.

The committee amendment raises a question which is not sectional, nor does it alone affect the transportation companies. It affects the producer and the manufacturer and the shipper.

The amendment to section 11 of this bill, as offered by the committee, provides:

* * * It shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatever * * * in any common carrier by water with which such railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic, and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear what is going on very well over here, but I am told that two gentlemen are pleading in favor of one amendment. That is out of order. There ought to be a speech for the amendment and one in reply, and then a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts was recognized because he was the only Member asking for recognition. The Chair will recognize a Member in opposition immediately following the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the transportation system of New England has been developed by through routes by rail and water, both owned by the same companies. This amendment, which makes it unlawful for railroads to own competing vessel lines, comes as a complete surprise to the shippers in my part of the country. The subject has no necessary connection with the Panama Canal. In none of the hearings held before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was it mentioned, much less urged. The arguments before the committee upon railroad-owned ships were confined to keeping them out of the canal.

The substance of section 11 first appeared in House bill 21889, introduced March 14, 1912, by Mr. COVINGTON, of Maryland. It was entitled "A bill to amend the act to regulate commerce," and so forth.

On March 15, 1912, being the following day, Mr. ADAMSON introduced House bill 21969, in which Mr. COVINGTON'S bill appeared as section 11. March 16, 1912, House bill 21969 was committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed. There was no time or opportunity to be heard in opposition to this section, although months had been given to all interested to appear before the committee and be heard upon the rest of the bill.

Section 11 introduced for the first time a radical change in the industrial, commercial, and transportation policy of the country, and it is now sought to be enacted into law without giving the committee the benefit of any information as to its effect upon industries of the country. It would be as unreasonable to compel the railroads to sell their water lines because traffic would compete with their rail lines, as to make railroad companies dispose of a part of their system which operated lines that competed with another part.

The portion of section 11, if enacted into law, will radically change the method of doing business in New England and reverse a policy which in history has grown up naturally and proved to be the proper method of handling commodities between New England ports and other ports on the Atlantic coast.

The natural growth of the common ownership and cooperation between railroads and water carriers is seen in the following brief historical sketch, which shows that the rail and water transportation forms continuous lines:

HISTORY OF NEW ENGLAND RAILROADS.

The Fall River Line, running from New Bedford and Fall River, respectively, to New York City, was organized and the vessels thereof were built by the Old Colony Railroad Co. in 1874. At that time the Old Colony Railroad Co. operated between Boston and Fall River and Boston and New Bedford. It built the steamboats of the Fall River Line in order to carry freight and passengers between New York and Boston. In 1892 the Old Colony Railroad Co. was leased to the New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad Co., and the Fall River Line was a part of the leased property.

The Providence & Stonington Line was built by the New York, Providence & Boston Railroad Co. in 1873. Its steamers ran between Providence and Stonington on the one hand and New York City on the other. It was the means by which the Boston & Providence Railroad Co. operated between Boston and Providence, and the New York, Providence & Boston operated between Providence and Stonington, reached New York City. These companies by lease came into the control of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. in 1892, at about the same time the Old Colony Railroad Co. lease was made.

The Norwich Line was built by the Norwich and Worcester Railroad Co. in 1860. It was the means by which the Norwich & Worcester Railroad Co., operating between Norwich and Worcester, reached New York City.

The Norwich & Worcester Railroad Co. was eventually leased to the New York and New England Railroad Co., operating between Boston and Putnam, Conn., and the New York & New England Railroad Co. in 1898 leased to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co.

The New Haven Steamboat Line began in 1824, running between New Haven and New York City. It formed a through route in connection with stagecoaches and freight wagons between New York City, New Haven, and Hartford, Conn., and Springfield, Mass.

Upon the construction of the Hartford & New Haven Railroad Co., running between New Haven, through Hartford to Springfield, the New Haven Steamboat Line continued to operate as a through line in connection with said railroad and for several years retarded the building of a rail line between New Haven and New York City, because the proposed railroad could not compete with the steamboats of the New Haven line and it was not thought that such a rail line would pay. In fact, whereas the north and south line between New Haven and Springfield was built in 1834, the line between New Haven and New York was not built until 13 years later. 1847.

The Bridgeport Line was one of the earliest steamboat lines to come into existence after Fulton's invention of the steamboat.

For many years prior to the building of the Hudson River Railroad it run between New York and Bridgeport and carried the mails between New York and Albany via the Housatonic Railroad Co. and the Boston & Albany Railroad Co.

The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. orginally consisted of the Hartford & New Haven Railroad Co., before mentioned, and the New York & New Haven Railroad Co. They were consolidated in 1872. The other rail lines were gradually absorbed by lease or consolidation, until 1892 there was for the first time an all-rail line under common control between New York and Boston.

It will be seen that originally each of the steamboat lines was a coadjutor of a rail line. They became competitors only when the various rail lines came under a common control and formed a through line between New York and the various Long Island Sound and Narragansett Bay ports herein mentioned.

These lines have produced and developed traffic which all shipping to and from New England follows:

West bound, they carry from the various ports and from interior points the finished products of the New England cotton, woolen, brass, hardware, and other manufacturers. They deliver same to the various docks at the southern end of Manhattan Island contiguous to the wholesale district of New York City, where each of these commodities is handled. Goods presented for shipment in the afternoon are delivered in New York early the following morning. If, instead of going by boat they are shipped all-rail, delivery in New York is necessarily delayed because the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co.'s rail terminals in New York City are on the north side of the Harlem River, whence cars must be unloaded of their contents or floated to the various New York piers.

WATER LINES PREFERRED.

In any case there is a delay beyond the time required for handling them by water. The water lines are, therefore, preferred by New England manufacturers to the rail lines, and many protests have been filed by chambers of commerce and manufacturers' associations against a compulsory discontinuance of this method of doing business.

If the New Haven road is required to dispose of its steamboats, it naturally will carry all-rail as much traffic as possible, with a resulting delay to the shippers.

Eastbound the water lines receive from the railroad terminating on the west side of the North River and from coastwise steamship companies raw materials, such as cotton, wool, pig iron, and copper, and carry it to Long Island Sound and Narragansett Bay ports for shipment to the interior.

In times of congestion of traffic, which frequently happens, even upon the four or more tracks running between New York and Boston, the New Haven road is able to divert to the water lines shipments which otherwise it could not handle expeditiously.

It will thus be seen that this traffic has grown up in a natural way without thought of or attention to competitive conditions, and that it is to the interest of New England that it should continue.

Mr. HIGGINS. I want to interrupt the gentleman for a suggestion, that what the gentleman has said about the New York, New Haven & Hartford road applies equally well to the Grand Trunk Railroad.

Mr. PETERS. Certainly. I understand, through the newspapers, that it is proposed to run a new line by the Grand Trunk Railroad into the city of Providence, and then that railroad is to run steamboats into New York City. The commercial bodies and shippers in New England are unanimous in opposition to the change proposed in this bill. The directors of the port of Boston passed resolutions on April 11, 1912, which I wish to submit to the committee:

DIRECTORS OF PORT OF BOSTON.

At a meeting of the directors of the port of Boston April 11, 1912, the following statement was adopted as the opinion of the directors of the port of Boston concerning a proposed amendment to section 5 of the interstate-commerce act, contained in section 11 of the Panama Canal bill, No. 21969, and it was voted that a copy of this vote be sent to each member of the Massachusetts delegation in Congress.

The Panama Canal bill reported to the House of Representatives, Congress of the United States, as House bill No. 21969, contains in section 11 an amendment to section 5 of the interstate-commerce act, as follows:

"From and after the 1st day of July, 1913, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

This is followed by a provision, in substance, that any railway controlling a water carrier engaged in foreign trade and having through rates and facilities with it shall, upon request, provide like port facilities, connections, and joint through rates for and in connection with any water carrier engaged in the lake, river, or coastwise trade of the United States, including trade through the Panama Canal.

The enactment of such legislation would be detrimental to the port of Boston and to the transportation of both passengers and commodities of the Commonwealth. It is certainly unwise as an incident to the regulation of traffic through the Panama Canal to enact a drastic change affecting transportation facilities and methods whose development in New England covers a century, where the connection of steamship lines and their control by railroads is as old as the construction of the railroads themselves. This bill commands the disruption of serviceable and efficiently operated transportation systems involving, if the compliance of law is to be more than in form, the sale of valuable properties, probably in many cases at a loss, many of which can not be operated independently with the same degree of efficiency as at the present time.

Such legislation threatens to place American railway interests under a severe handicap in competition with Canadian railways. It has been the distinct policy of the Canadian Government to encourage and assist its railways in the development of steamship facilities. A provision having this in view is incorporated in the contract of July 29, 1903, between the Dominion Government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Co.

At the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce it was testified that "the entire transportation of Canada with England and Japan is in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railroad. They are one of the largest ship-owning companies on the Continent of North America, and they are closely followed by the Grand Trunk."

Cosidering the vast extent of the financial assistance given by the Canadian Government to its railroads and the distinct tendency of its policy regarding steamship connections up to this time, there is no indication that the early future will see any change of policy in this regard. The result of the proposed restriction of American railways therefore may be a severe discrimination against them.

It is not suggested that our Government should in any way change its policy in the direction of restricting our railways in the ownership or control of vessels engaged in the foreign carrying trade, whether through the Panama Canal or not. That such ownership or control, especially on the Pacific Ocean, has been much to the benefit of our foreign commerce is not denied.

It is obvious that in many cases the enterprise of a railway company in establishing foreign steamship lines might depend, to a great extent, upon its opportunities for operating domestic steamship lines in connection with them. The use of common wharf facilities, the stopping at domestic ports of foreign-bound vessels, and other factors might have an important bearing; yet it is proposed in this legislation to deny to our railroad companies the privilege of operating such lines—a restriction which may operate, as indicated, in very undesirable ways as respects our foreign commerce.

The argument which has apparently brought about this amendment to the interstate-commerce law is the fear that railroad owned or operated vessels will be in a position to control coast traffic through the Panama Canal. These arguments allege that railway companies would be in a position to, by drastic reductions in rates, drive independent competitive lines out of business, and also wherever railroad companies own or control steamship lines it is the tendency for rates on such lines to be finally adjusted at a level above the normal for water carriage.

It is believed that this danger is not a serious one and, moreover, it could be entirely obviated by giving certain discretionary powers to the canal administration.

Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, said in his testimony before the committee: "My own opinion is that to simply prohibit lines which were partly owned or controlled by railroad lines from using the canal or to discriminate against them would be an ineffective remedy. I do not believe in it myself. I have seen it tried in the case of competing railroads, and our experience has been that it has never worked. I am pleased to say that the President, who last year (1911) recommended that, on further reflection has changed his view and does not think now that it would be the most effective way of treating the problem. Col. Goethals has expressed himself to the effect that this legislation is not necessary, and that any difficulties can be met when they arise."

In imposing the restriction in question upon railroads in respect to "any common carrier by water with which said railroad * * * does or may compete for traffic," the proposed law is vague and indefinite. It does not state what circumstances constitute competition. It makes no distinction between a case such as that of the Long Island Sound lines, operating between the same points as the controlling railroad, and steamship lines which might possibly be considered competitive in a sense, because forming a small connecting link in a long through route of which the controlling railroad is also a part. The result of this vagueness might be to forbid the establishment of a steamship line which in the promotion of foreign or domestic trade would be of great public benefit. The proposed new steamship line of the Grand Trunk from Providence to New York is a case in point.

In attempting to discourage monopoly of domestic traffic by placing this restriction upon the railroads, the law could easily have the effect of fostering and promoting steamship monopoly, since it would be forbidden for a railroad to establish a steamship line in competition with existing independent lines; also the law certainly would not restrict and might promote industrial monopoly through the control by large corporations of steamship lines.

The Standard Oil Co. operates a large fleet of American and foreign vessels. The Steel Corporation has a large fleet on the Great Lakes.

The proposed legislation wholly overlooks many important public advantages resulting from the control and operation of coastwise steamship lines by strong railroad companies. As was, by implication, admitted by Mr. Wheeler, such lines provide in many cases excellent passenger facilities and in convenient connection with trains, the two services perhaps actually connecting on the wharf. They facilitate railway operations by taking, to a considerable extent, the heavy freight. In some cases there are peculiar advantages. For example, the New England Navigation Co., controlled by the New York, New Haven & Hartford, can deliver freight directly to the lower part of New York City, while the railway lines must leave their freight at points far up town.

The competition between railroads and their controlled steamship lines is not necessarily or without qualification mock, as stated in the majority report of the committee. While the relations are necessarily close and friendly, the rates and service on the steamship line are governed by actual or potential competition of other steamship lines, involving, of necessity, some actual competition between rail and boat.

The policy embodied in this legislation must have a strong tendency to stultify enterprise, to stand in the way of large and important undertakings having the backing of strong financial interests. That it is not good policy to hamper enterprise in this manner is evidenced by the aggressive opposite policy of the Canadian Government above referred to and by the passive approval by our own Government of the enterprise of railways in the foreign carrying trade.

It has been suggested that, instead of an outright prohibition such as proposed, there be some discrimination against steamship lines in domestic trade controlled by railroads by way of tolls not exacted from independent steamships or higher tolls. This policy is open to most of the same objections, and it may be noted that our Government passes all vessels through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal without toll, though many of these vessels on the Great Lakes are controlled by railroads, while many others are controlled by industrial corporations.

In this case we follow the policy of the Canadian Government at the same point, canal facilities being also freely interchanged between the two countries.

It has been urged that the restriction proposed might foster steamship monopoly by forbidding the establishment of competitive lines by railroads. It is also true that this policy might foster monopoly by certain railroad systems by preventing the establishment by one railroad of steamship lines to enable it to compete with another railroad or to make more advantageous through rates. The terms of the act do not appear to be intended as applying to steamship lines which are extensions of railway systems rather than duplications of existing service; but in view of the indefinite terms of the act it is a grave question whether the restriction would not sometimes have the effect suggested. Supposing, for example, that the Pennsylvania Railroad proposed to establish a line of steamships from New York to Boston, but would do so only if able to make stops at certain Long Island points. Inasmuch as this company controls the Long Island Railroad, such stops on Long Island might be held illegal, and thus Boston might fail to receive the benefit of an additional steamship line. On the other hand, the Pennsylvania Railroad might legally operate the South lines, whereas it would be more to our advantage to have them operated by a railroad subject to some local control.

The difficulty of enforcing to the full any prohibition of ownership or control such as proposed is well known. In view of this, the restriction might operate as a severe discrimination, some railway systems being in a position to conceal their ownership or control while others could not do so.

Railroads, in some instances, may operate connecting steamship lines without profit or at a loss, owing to their value as "feeders" or through connections. It can not be expected that such lines could be operated by independent capital. It is claimed, for example, that the Merchants & Miners Transportation Co., controlled by the New York, New Haven & Hartford, is not in itself profitable. This line is of great value to Boston in many ways; among others, in protecting the New England differential basis in traffic with the West. It also provides valuable passenger facilities.

The proposed legislation would also involve danger of public injury in regard to through rates. The interstate-commerce law does not compel a railroad to join in the making of a through rate unless the route to which such a rate applies embraces substantially the whole length of the rail lines of the company. A railroad, however, should be willing to join in through rates on a route embracing part of its rail lines, together with steamship lines which it controls, especially if such route were to be in competition with some other through route. As an example, the instances might be cited of the differential through rate made by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad on westbound traffic from New York in connection with its Sound steamship lines. Prohibition of the control of these lines by the New York, New Haven & Hartford might deprive the public of the benefit of such differential.

Having already severely restricted the railroads in reduction of rates to meet water competition, it is now proposed that Congress by this legislation shall forbid the railroads to protect themselves even by owning or controlling water carriers. This seems a hardship in any fair consideration of the case.

It is to be remembered that even in the restricted way in which Congress does permit the lowering of railway rates to meet water competition the fact is recognized that such competition may be a most serious menace to such railroads and their security holders, not to speak of the public, which depends upon their efficient service.

It is also to be remembered that for a railroad to stand in the way of independent water competition is not an easy matter. The use of water routes can not be limited, and only in the case, which should be guarded against, of a railroad having complete monopoly of dock facilities can it become very difficult for independent lines to be established.

It may be freely conceded that all actions of a railroad tending to deny to independent companies proper and fair facilities for their service and equal treatment in switching charges and similar matters should be vigorously opposed by the proper public authorities.

SUMMARY.

The directors of the port of Boston regard section 11 of the Panama Canal bill (H. R. 21969), which forbids railroads from being interested in water lines, wherever located, which compete or may compete, as detrimental to the port of Boston and the State of Massachusetts.

The bill would disrupt valuable transportation routes of many years standing, such as the Long Island Sound lines, which have no reference to the Panama Canal.

It would place American railways under a severe handicap compared with Canadian railways, which are encouraged to go into the steamship business.

The danger feared—the detrimental control by railroads of coast traffic through the Panama Canal—can be avoided in other ways, as, for instance, giving the canal administration certain discretionary powers.

It would tend to restrict the development of steamship lines as parts of competitive routes.

It might promote rather than prevent monopoly of steamship service.

It overlooks the important public advantage resulting from control of coastwise lines by strong railroad companies in protecting rates through offering differential routes.

Water transportation can be monopolized only if dock facilities are monopolized, which is the essential thing to be guarded against.

I wish also to submit copy of a protest filed by New England manufacturers:

COPY OF PROTEST FILED BY NEW ENGLAND MANUFACTURERS.

APRIL 27, 1912.

We, the undersigned, being actively interested in the manufacture of cotton goods in New England, understand that the Covington amendment, so called, to the bill now before Congress regulating the passage of vessels through the Panama Canal, provides that "it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier, subject to the act to regulate commerce, to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever, directly or indirectly, in any common carrier by water with which said railroad does or may compete for traffic."

We believe in the regulation of common carriers by the Government.

We do not, however, believe in such restriction or limitation of investment in or the development of steamship lines or coastwise trade generally as this amendment provides.

We deem it especially important for the great industries of New England, that under proper restrictions, railroads should be allowed to develop and maintain transportation by water. This is of the utmost importance in the transportation of the freight to and from New England points and the South, especially in connection with the cotton industry.

We believe that, with the opening of the Panama Canal, it is of the greatest importance that there shall be adequate transportation facilities by water between New England and the Gulf cities.

Therefore we protest against the adoption of the Covington amendment to the Panama Canal bill as unnecessarily impeding the development of transportation by water, and as thus retarding the development of New England's commerce with southern and Pacific ports, and we urge New England Congressmen to do everything in their power to defeat this amendment.

RHODE ISLAND LEGISLATURE.

So great has been the importance of this proposed change that the Rhode Island Legislature has itself passed a resolution in regard to it, which I now present to the committee:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, ETC.,
IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
January Session, A. D. 1912.

Resolution requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Rhode Island concerning House resolution 21969, pending in Sixty-second Congress of the United States.

Whereas it has been the policy of this State, beginning with the earliest railroad charters, to authorize and encourage railroad companies to build their railroads to tidewater, to own wharves and docks, and to operate, or to own the stock of companies operating steamboats; and

Whereas in the last railroad charter granted, and as late as the year 1910, the General Assembly of Rhode Island, in furtherance of this policy, authorized the building to tidewater, the owning of wharves and docks, and the operation of, and ownership of the stock of, other companies which operate steamboats or steamships; and

Whereas section 11 of a bill pending in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States numbered 21969 and entitled "A bill to provide for the opening, maintaining, protection, and operating of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone" is contrary to the said policy of this State; said section being as follows:

"SEC. 11. That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof as follows:

"'From and after the 1st day of July, 1913, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense'": Now therefore

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island opposes any action by Congress in conflict with the beneficial policy of this State as aforesaid, and that the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Rhode Island be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to do all in their power to the end that section 11 of said bill be stricken therefrom.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Providence, April 26, 1912.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original resolution approved by his excellency the governor on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1912.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State aforesaid the date first above written.

[SEAL.] J. FRED. PARKER,
Secretary of State.

This legislation was brought up without any opportunity for the shippers in New England or for those on the Great Lakes, many of whom are in the same situation, to appear and present their views. It is brought up under a bill which purports to affect alone legislation on the Panama Canal. We are attempting to legislate on a subject, the ownership of boat lines, which the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries are themselves investigating. Whatever may be the difficulties presented by the situation of the operation of the canal, it is obviously unjust and unfair to involve the shippers and people of the Atlantic coast cities and Great Lakes in far-reaching changes in their transportation system solely for the purpose of meeting conditions incident to the operation of the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts having replied to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] as a substitute to that offered by the committee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BROUSSARD) there were 18 ayes and 45 noes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I demand tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken, and only seven Members arising—not a sufficient number—tellers were refused.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4 of the committee substitute, line 18, after the word "country," add the words:

"Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall apply to arrangements which may be entered into between a rail carrier and vessels of the United States registered in a foreign trade."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, paragraph d, page 4, of this amendment is in these words:

If any rail carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce enters into arrangements with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, for the handling of through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Interstate Commerce Commission may require such railway to enter into similar arrangements with any or all other lines of steamships operating from said port to the same foreign country.

It is not possible in the few moments at my disposal to do more than call attention to the manner in which this paragraph discriminates against American interests in favor of foreign shipping. It makes it impossible for any railroad in the United States to enter into any freight arrangement with an American built and owned steamship line plying between an American port and a foreign port, which it may not be required to enter into with a foreign line operating between the same ports. In effect this is a discrimination against ships of the United States, although upon the face of the paragraph it would appear to be a provision to prevent discrimination. I am sure this was not the intention of the committee, but it is just what the paragraph will accomplish, unless some such amendment as that which I have proposed is adopted. It is a well-known fact that all German railroads having connections with steamship lines engaged in foreign commerce give to German-owned ships material advantages in freight rates over the ships of every other nationality.

If, therefore, American railroads are prohibited from giving equal advantages to American ships competing for traffic with German ships between ports of the two countries, it must be evident to everybody that the American ships will be at a decided disadvantage. And yet this is just what this paragraph does. Is it conceivable that if this paragraph is enacted into law as it now stands an American ship will ever be built to sail between an American and a German port in competition with German ships? The laws of Germany not only permit, but they encourage, the granting of exclusive advantages to German ships carrying products exported from and imported into Germany. The railroad companies of Germany therefore give lower rates or other advantages to German ships which this paragraph will not permit American railroads to give to American ships engaged in the same trade. I can not believe that those who are responsible for this paragraph could have been aware of the conditions to which I have briefly called the attention of the House. The purpose evidently was to prevent railroads from discriminating in favor of one of the interior cities of the United States as against another of those cities. I can not believe that those who framed this paragraph understood that it would operate, as I have endeavored to point out, to prevent American ships from competing with the ships of other countries upon fair and equal terms. I am not asking in my amendment for any advantage for American shipping engaged in foreign trade; I am only asking that there shall be no legislation which will tend—indeed, which will surely operate—to injure, if not to utterly destroy, the little that is now left of our foreign merchant marine.

If there is nothing which Congress can or will do to encourage ship building and ship owning in the United States, surely we should do nothing to discourage or prevent it. If this character of legislation is persisted in, the day may not be far distant when there will not be a merchant ship on the high seas flying the American flag.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that amendment again reported. I do not think I quite understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there was any chicanery about this at all. I think the committee understood what it was doing.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in favor of the committee amendment, and against the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

[Mr. SMALL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2 of the Adamson substitute, lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that gentlemen are denominating that substitute wrongly. It ought to be the committee amendment or committee substitute.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the first part of section 11 gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction to determine the matter of competition between vessels and railways and whether the existing service is in violation of the provisions of the section. The last clause in that paragraph reads:

In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.

I had supposed that it was elementary that no order of the Interstate Commerce Commission could be made final, thus taking away from the courts the power of review of that order. It seems to me so elementary that it ought not to require discussion. I am aware—as I have discussed the matter with some members of the committee—that they point to the fact that findings of fact of the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to rates are final, and, therefore, they say this is doing nothing more than that law now provides with reference to rates, but those gentlemen seem to forget that the findings of fact made by the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to rates are not carried into final orders at all. Rates are predicated upon those findings, and the law itself provides for a court review of those orders; and, Mr. Chairman, here comes the distinction, because the fixing of the rate is an act legislative in its nature and beyond the power of the court to review, so far as the facts are concerned on which that rate was based, and there are but two things that the court can inquire into. One is as to whether the commission has exceeded its powers—that is, the authority granted it by Congress—and, second, whether or not the rates fixed are confiscatory, or, in other words, invade the constitutional rights of the carrier. Now, with reference to this provision: What is the order that will be made by the commission? The commission will make an order either finding that there is a violation of the provisions of this section or that there is not, and if the order be that there is a violation of this provision, and these orders shall be final, what situation are we in? An action is brought. There is a penalty in the interstate-commerce law, and this section is made a part of that law, subjecting the carrier to that penalty. You have deprived that carrier of his day in court.

Now, so far as authorities are concerned, the Members of the House are familiar with the leading case of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. against Minnesota, One hundred and thirty-fourth United States. There was a case where it was undertaken by the State of Minnesota to make the orders of its State railway commission final and conclusive, as here you are attempting to make the orders of this class of cases final and conclusive, and with reference to that the court, in finding that law was unconstitutional, said:

It deprives the company of its right to a judicial investigation by due process of law under the forms and with the machinery provided by the wisdom of successive ages for the investigation judicially of the truth of a matter in controversy and substitutes therefor, as an absolute finality, the action of a railroad commission which, in view of the powers conceded to it by the State court, can not be regarded as clothed with judicial functions or possessing the machinery of a court of justice.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that decision of the Supreme Court is clearly upon all fours with this provision and condemns it, and because I am very much in favor of this substitute I want to see this provision stricken out. It is absolutely unnecessary; it can do no good and may do harm.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. It is entirely true, as he states, that you can not constitutionally deprive any railroad company owning a water carrier of its right to have a legal question judicially determined by the courts; but, Mr. Chairman, it is well known that the Interstate Commerce Commission can determine finally all issues of fact, and that the whole purpose of the interstate-commerce law is to permit that to be done. One of the most serious questions that is now agitating this country is whether or not the recently created Commerce Court is rightfully passing upon orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission by going so far as to review the determination of questions of fact which have been decided by the commission.

Now, all that the pending provision does is to permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine finally the specific question of fact whether or not any given water carrier is in competition with a railroad company which is in part the owner or wholly the owner of it. It does not seek to deprive the railroad company owning the water carrier of any constitutional right which it possesses, but it simply makes final the determination by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the issue of facts involved.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman permit a question? Could the carrier make any defense in the courts?

Mr. COVINGTON. Not as to the simple question of whether the water carrier is or is not in competition with the railroad owner.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not that the entire question and the only prohibition there is in the section? It is the ultimate fact that is in issue.

Mr. COVINGTON. It is the ultimate fact in issue, but it is determined in the same way and by a power of the same character that the commission now makes its findings upon.

Mr. LENROOT. Then have not you deprived the carrier of his day in court when you make this order final?

Mr. COVINGTON. I think not.

Mr. LENROOT. Is there any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the interstate-commerce law that is made final as you propose to make this order final?

Mr. COVINGTON. But the gentleman understands if this order should be confiscatory of any right of the railroad company that the question developed by the order would not deter the railroad company from appealing and going to the courts.

Mr. LENROOT. But it would determine that this entire section is unconstitutional, as was expressly held by the decision of the court.

Mr. COVINGTON. The order would determine the finding of fact by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the railroad company would then simply have its appeal when it could show that it was deprived of a constitutional right in that its property had been confiscated—that is to say, deprived of its property without due process of law.

Mr. LENROOT. But no order in the interstate-commerce law is made final, and there is the distinction between that Minnesota case. They attempted in that case to make it final, and that is what condemned the entire act.

Mr. COVINGTON. All findings of fact are final.

Mr. LENROOT. The finding of fact was final only because the order is predicated upon it, which is legislative in its nature. It is not so in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT) there were—ayes 42, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 11 of the amendment in line 15, after the word "traffic," page 1, by adding thereto the following words: "Through the canal."

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may thoroughly understand the effect of the amendment which I offer to section 11 of the bill, it is important to call the attention of the House to exactly what it now provides for, and even in this connection I can add very little to my remarks made a few days ago when this whole bill was under consideration.

In brief, this section provides that from and after July 1, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever—by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner—in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; in other words, it is made unlawful for any railroad company after that date to have or hold any interest, directly or indirectly, in any of the stocks or bonds, or in any other manner, in any water transportation company.

The application of this section is not limited, as I previously pointed out, to water transportation lines which are to use the Panama Canal, but it is a general provision which applies throughout the whole country to all railroad companies which have or own an interest in water transportation companies. Just why such an important provision has been put in this act, which exclusively relates to the Panama Canal and transportation through the same, I am unable to conceive. The only justification for dealing with that subject at all would be to confine its operation to those lines that use the Panama Canal, and even in such cases it is of very doubtful propriety. As applied to the rest of the country it is wholly unjustifiable and will lead to serious results, little appreciated, I fear, even by the membership of this House.

Let us inquire briefly what its results will be. It is known by all men that the great transportation business of the United States is now carried on by the combined efforts of railroad and water transportation companies on our Great Lakes and rivers and on the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico. The railway companies, notwithstanding every reasonable effort on their part, discovered many years ago that they would be unable to take care of our great inland and coast commerce without the aid of water transportation.

Private capital could not be induced to invest in the construction and operation of these water lines. It was then that the railroads commenced to construct expensive docks, warehouses, elevators, and steamship lines in connection with their own roads for the purpose of furnishing adequate and cheaper facilities for the handling of our immense freight traffic. It resulted in greatly lessening the cost of transportation, and many railroad companies transport freight over their own water lines from 10 to 25 per cent cheaper than they can afford to by rail, and the result of their efforts has been to afford much greater and better facilities for transportation at a decreased cost.

It is quite useless and contrary to fact to say that there is no competition between water lines owned by railroad companies and the railroad or other water transportation lines, for, as I have pointed out, the railroad companies carry freight over their own water lines much cheaper than they do over the rail lines, and besides all this there is the keenest competition by water between lines owned by the railroad and those owned by independent companies; in other words, the railroad can not in the very nature of things charge any more for freight on their steamboat lines than other water transportation companies charge for the same services.

It is therefore apparent that present conditions do not call for legislation, but, on the contrary, demand that there shall be no such legislation as that proposed in section 11 of this bill. All the important railroads in the country are affected by it, and if they were obliged in this brief period of time allowed by this bill to dispose of their docks, warehouses, elevators, and steamboat lines it would not only be at a very great sacrifice, but it would seriously interfere with the great question of transportation, in which the general public is vitally interested. These steamship lines which are now owned by railroads were constructed and put in operation with special reference to their usefulness in connection with the railroad system. Operated in connection with the railroads, who have constructed, owned, and operated them, they are of great value and usefulness to the public in the handling of their freight, but separated from them they are little more than so much junk, for I think that it will be conceded that no one can be found who would be foolish enough to take this property off their hands and operate it at any price. If the edict goes forth that the railroad companies must do without water transportation to help them out, then they will do the best they can with the railroads and leave the water transportation companies to take care of themselves. Just what the situation would then be can be better imagined than told.

Personally, I can not conceive of any act on the part of Congress which is so uncalled for as this and which at the same time would not increase the facilities for transportation by a single point or decrease the charges therefor by so much as a penny, but, on the contrary, would greatly lessen our present facilities for transportation, and hence inevitably lead to an increase in cost. If this is reform, then, in the name of good sense, let us have less of it. Instead of increasing the transportation through the Panama Canal it will greatly lessen it by decreasing the facilities, and absolutely lead to a monopoly on the part of a few independent steamship companies who may use the canal, but whose facilities for actual transportation are absolutely insignificant. Instead of transportation being cheaper from coast to coast and on our inland waterways, it will be dearer and less effectively conducted.

I know that it has become very popular to denounce almost everything and everybody now which has furnished some evidence of a successful administration of their affairs, and, in particular, the railroads. There was a time when this Government was very solicitous about railroads and their construction, and offered them large grants of land as a bonus for the construction of railways. Now, that they have been constructed and are under successful operation, it would seem that a vast majority of the Members of this body were seeking either to destroy them or render them less capable of meeting the great public demands which are constantly made upon them.

I am not interested in transportation, either by rail or water, but I can very plainly see that the policy of our Government must be more generous toward our railroads or the public service must seriously suffer. I may say in passing that many of our large railroad companies, and in particular our transcontinental lines, have during the past 20 years been in the hands of receivers, and millions of dollars which were invested in their construction have been lost to the original investors. I think that I may say, without fear of successful contradiction, that there has been less return for the money invested, first and last, in the building of our railroads than in any other industry in which our people have been engaged. A few of them have made money all of the time, some of them a part of the time, and the rest of them none of the time.

It might not be opportune at this time to call attention to the fact that we have more miles of railroad in the United States than they have in the whole Continent of Europe and that they have been constructed at must less cost.

The average cost of construction per mile in the United States is about $60,000, while that of the United Kingdom of Great Britain is $274,000 per mile, Germany $111,000 per mile, France $141,000 per mile, Austria $116,000 per mile, Italy $125,000 per mile, and Belgium $187,000 per mile, while our passengers per mile and our freight per ton-mile are carried cheaper and quicker than in any other country in the world. At the same time, we observe that the total number of their employees is 1,695,000, who are paid wages to the amount of $1,230,800,000 per annum, a sum so vast that we are unable to grasp the importance of their successful operation and its effect upon the general prosperity of our country. It may also be stated in passing that the compensation of their employees has increased over $200,000,000 since 1905, while the average pay of their workmen is from two to four times as much as it is either in Great Britain or in any country on the continent of Europe. Notwithstanding these facts, and many more within the knowledge of every Member of this body, we are daily entertained with speeches against the railroads, as though they were an enemy to the Republic instead of being directly responsible, as they are, for substantially all of its entire development. Were the railroad companies to cease operating to-day and remain shut down for 30 days two-thirds of the people of the United States would be in a state of starvation, and Congress itself would be obliged to adjourn to where food was more plentiful than here in Washington.

But I am informed by my friend from California that the good railroad companies need have no fear of the provisions in this section, because it is provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission is to determine the question of fact as to whether they shall be compelled to dispose of their water line transportation or not. In this statement he is grossly mistaken. No such provision is to be found in the bill; in fact, its provisions are directly to the contrary, for it specifically provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction to determine the fact as to the competition or possibility of competition after full hearing—that is to say, if the railroad company owns or operates a steamship line which, if separated from it, would or could by any possibility compete with it, then and in such case it is within the prohibition of the law and separation must of necessity take place.

There is absolutely no discretion whatsoever vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission, for they are empowered only to ascertain the fact as to whether there is a possibility of competition, as, of course, in every single instance there would be so-called competition, if, indeed, all the water lines survived, of which I have some doubts.

The scheme seems to be, on the part of the promoters of this particular piece of legislation, to make the canal free to those who survive, and then to see to it that they have no competition whatsoever in their transportation business. The results of such legislation can be very easily appreciated except as to the extent of the damage done, which will be incalculable.

I have listened for several days, with both patience and amusement, to the advocates of free transportation for American ships through the Panama Canal. I have tried to demonstrate that under section 11 there would be many fewer ships to pass if it becomes a law. I have been greatly amused by the speeches which have been made by my fellow Members in favor of the consumer and declaring the great benefits which would accrue to him if tolls were abolished. We are informed by those having this bill in charge that the actual cost of tolls per ton would be about 50 cents, as provided for in this measure. We are further informed by our friends from the Pacific slope that what they have to sell and transport is largely fruit and fish. I can just imagine how grateful an economical housewife would be, upon returning from her daily marketing with six oranges weighing 3 pounds, one-half dozen lemons weighing 2 pounds, one box of grapes weighing 4 pounds, two boxes of figs weighing one-half pound, and two quarter-pound boxes of sardines and salmon, a total of 10 pounds of fruit and fish fresh from the Pacific slope via the Panama Canal, upon which the Government of this country by a free canal has lessened the cost to somebody in the enormous sum of exactly a quarter of 1 cent. I say somebody, for I feel quite sure that the purchaser would not be the person benefited.

Let us take another view of it by dealing in larger figures. Suppose an orange weighs on an average a half pound, and a good housewife, determined to secure the magnificent bounty intended by the House of Representatives that she should have, purchases a ton of oranges and actually makes 50 cents thereby. I can very clearly see that if she ate two a day it would require nearly six years in which to realize this enormous profit and advantage resulting from a free canal. And if she purchased a ton of salmon or sardines in quarter-pound packages, in which they are put up, in order to be the recipient of the Nation's generosity, she would have to consume two boxes a day for nearly 11 years. Of course everyone can now see how beneficial this magnificent and generous provision on the part of the United States is going to be to the consumer of fruit and fish from the Golden Gate of the Pacific. The mere trifle of Uncle Sam losing tolls, which would amount to several millions of dollars a year, while he is paying, as it has been estimated by the committee, from twenty-five to fifty millions of dollars a year for maintenance of the canal, after having invested $400,000,000 for construction, is of little consequence so long as the ultimate consumer is to be benefited by such vast sums as I have hereinbefore pointed out. Let us by all odds insist that Uncle Samuel shall furnish us free of Government tolls fruit, flowers, and fish. Then the Nation will be safe and correct principles of economy adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is recognized.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am ready for a vote.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Louisiana in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY]?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No; I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to say just a word in opposition to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. There is five minutes more for debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] wants that time, and I yield it to him.

Mr. BROUSSARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I should like to know whether, if because those who are opposed to the proposition would not use their time, arguments in behalf of it can not be made in the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY].

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I will state in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] that the original amendment touching this question which I proposed in the committee applied only to the Panama Canal. But the members of the committee, with whom I agreed, believed that if it was bad policy for railroads to own water lines in competition with themselves through the Panama Canal it was well to apply this principle throughout the entire country where railroads operate water lines in competition with themselves for traffic. [Applause.]

I think everyone will admit that where railroads own water lines in competition with themselves they have but one purpose in view, and that purpose is to neutralize competition. For over 30 years we of California and of the Pacific coast have had a bitter experience in the matter of the railroad control of competing water lines, and that experience has resulted in the demand to this body that the pending Panama Canal bill should contain a provision that will forever prevent the railroads of this country from stifling competition through the Panama Canal, which we expect will be of great benefit as a regulator of rail rates.

Before this House on Thursday I gave a history of the stifling of water competition by the transcontinental railroads in California for the past 30 years, showing the necessity for this provision.

I disagree with my friend from New York [Mr. MALBY] in his statement that this does not give the railroads a day in court. The substitute which the committee proposed confers jurisdiction upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition. There might be cases, for instance, and probably the gentleman has some in mind, where the operation of a water line by a railroad would not be a case that would be barred by this statute. The Interstate Commerce Commission, I take it, would be broadminded enough and fair enough not to prohibit the owning of a water line where that water line did not compete with a railroad. The committee therefore proposed this amendment in order to give jurisdiction to the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine, perhaps, questions such as the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] has proposed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, strike out the word "order" and insert in lieu thereof the words "findings of fact."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the substitute offered by the committee.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending to section 12. The Clerk will report that amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there is no other amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has an amendment pending to section 12.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this proposition to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]: We have not time to agree about his amendment to-night. I do not believe there is a quorum here in the House.

I do not care to stay here for three or four roll calls, and I therefore will move that the committee rise, and when the bill comes up for a vote in the House the gentleman from Illinois and I can at that time arrange and agree upon an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I do not object to the gentleman's motion that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House if the gentleman will permit me, in the House, to offer the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that he——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it is understood between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself that if he does not agree with the committee he may rise in the House and offer his amendment in the House.

I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment, pending that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments thereto to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LLOYD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, and had directed him to report it back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee has had under consideration House bill 21969, and has directed him to report it back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman agreed to let me offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is an understanding between the gentleman from Illinois and myself that he shall offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. But if the gentleman moves the previous question I can not.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Illinois an amendment to offer?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If the previous question is not ordered on this bill, what will be its status to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will not have any status to-morrow morning.

Mr. GARNER. What status will it have on Thursday morning?

The SPEAKER. It will be the unfinished business on Thursday morning.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to modify my motion.

The SPEAKER. Unless the previous question is ordered, the Chair will be in doubt whether it will be the unfinished business or not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, subject to the right of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to offer an amendment, I move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will offer the amendment now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will not lose his right to move the previous question.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If the previous question is ordered now, would that exclude a motion to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. To-morrow being Calendar Wednesday, if the previous question is ordered, on Thursday the gentleman would have the right of way to call up his bill, he having a privileged bill which he can call up at any time under an order that the House has already made?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois has a proposition which I have agreed to, and I want him to have the time to study it, and therefore I move the previous question subject to his right to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the previous question is ordered he may have the right to offer one amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that after the previous question is ordered the gentleman from Illinois may be permitted to offer an amendment to the bill in the House.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not think the gentleman could possibly deprive any Member of the House not here present from exercising the right to object on Thursday. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be the order of business immediately after the reading of the Journal on Thursday.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request and will let the gentleman from Illinois offer his amendment now.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be waived, as it has already been read in committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to waive the reading of the amendment, it having been read in committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 18955. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 18954. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 18335. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 18337. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

S. 6603. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the board of education of New Hanover County, N. C., portion of marine-hospital reservation not needed for marine-hospital purposes.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who wish may have five legislative days in which to print remarks on this bill, and for those who have spoken to extend remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that Members may have five legislative days to print remarks on this bill, and for those who have spoken to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GALLAGHER, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of F. E. Alvord, H. R. 12660, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 22, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1090) providing for guides in the District of Columbia, and defining their duties, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 742), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 23) to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 743), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RAKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 6508) to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in the Chuckawalla Valley, Cal., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 748), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23799) to amend "An act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges or viaducts across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 744), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 6614) to authorize the construction of a pontoon bridge across the Red River of the North between Pembina, N. Dak., and St. Vincent, Minn., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 745), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 6848) authorizing the Cooper River Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Carolina, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Goose Creek, in Berkeley County, S. C., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 747), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. RAKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 22437) for the relief of A. W. Toreson, son and heir of Anna M. Toreson, deceased, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 746), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LAFFERTY: A bill (H. R. 24735) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the validation of certain homestead entries," approved March 3, 1911; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. ROBINSON: A bill (H. R. 24736) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to construct a new bathhouse on the Hot Springs Reservation, Ark., for the accommodation of indigents; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24737) to authorize the investigation of the physiological and therapeutical effects of the waters of the Hot Springs of Arkansas, and to report upon the application of these waters to the alleviation and cure of diseases; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CURLEY: A bill (H. R. 24738) granting land for sanitarium to Order of Owls; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MARTIN of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 24751) authorizing a conditional grant of public lands for public school site; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. GILLETT: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 317) providing that employees of the Government shall receive pay for Labor Day; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AUSTIN: A bill (H. R. 24739) to reinstate Robert N. Campbell as a first lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COPLEY: A bill (H. R. 24740) granting a pension to Sadie Barrett; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24741) granting an increase of pension to Grove E. Jarvis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CURRIER: A bill (H. R. 24742) restoring to the pension roll the name of Harriett Littlefield; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DAVENPORT: A bill (H. R. 24743) to correct the military record of Platoff P. Bush; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24744) to correct the military record of Jesse J. Clemmons; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FERGUSSON: A bill (H. R. 24745) for the relief of Isidoro Otero; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24746) to correct the military record of A. W. Sudduth; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina: A bill (H. R. 24747) for the relief of the heirs of John P. Clark; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 24748) granting a pension to Zorel Tipton; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24749) granting an increase of pension to Eliza C. Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 24750) granting an increase of pension to Lucille M. Bertolette; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOSS of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 24752) for the relief of John W. Baker; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 24753) for the relief of W. M. Crossthwaite; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. PARRAN: A bill (H. R. 24754) for the relief of the estate of George Lloyd Raley; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. PUJO: A bill (H. R. 24755) for the relief of heirs of Michael Emonet; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. REILLY: A bill (H. R. 24756) to remove the charge of desertion against Henry A. Lain; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24757) for the relief of Charles H. Quackenbush; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: A bill (H. R. 24758) granting a pension to John S. Huston; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POWERS: A bill (H. R. 24759) granting a pension to Leander Cook; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24760) granting an increase of pension to Judah Howard; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. AYRES: Petition of Independent Chennoritzu Lodge, No. 520, Independent Order B'rith Abraham, New York, protesting against restriction of immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of residents of the Bronx, favoring restriction of immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, favoring restriction of immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of Taxpayers' Alliance, Borough of the Bronx, N. Y., praying for proper improvement of the Bronx Kills; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BOWMAN: Petition of Daughters of Liberty, West Hazelton, Pa., and Farmers' Union, both favoring restriction of immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of J. H. R. Storey, favoring passage of House bill 1339, for increasing pension of veterans of the Civil War who have lost an arm or leg; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 22, 1912.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 18041) granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2228. An act to establish Ashtabula, Ohio, a subport of entry in the customs collection district of Cuyahoga County, and for other purposes;

S. 6160. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River in the State of North Dakota;

S. 6161. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Yellowstone River, in the county of Dawson, State of Montana;

S. 6472. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain land to the First Baptist Church of Plymouth, Mass.;

H. R. 14052. An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to issue certain reports relating to cotton; and

H. R. 21590. An act to authorize levee and drainage district No. 25, Dunklin County, Mo., to construct and maintain a levee across a branch or cut-off of St. Francis River, and to construct and maintain a levee across the mouth of the Varney River, in the State of Missouri.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—ALASKAN GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I rise to read a paragraph from a paper published at Olympia, Wash., called the State Capitol Record. The paragraph to which I refer reads as follows:

> Senator BRISTOW, of Kansas, archinsurgent, does not think that the Senate is yet prepared with sufficient information to act on a Territorial bill. Hence he has secured the adoption by the Senate Committee on Territories, in executive session, of a resolution declaring that the committee will report no Alaska government bill until it has had the benefit of the report of the Senate committee appointed last year to go to Alaska and "investigate conditions."
> The committee of investigation did not go last year because of the special session. There is small chance of it going this year because of the campaign. Under the Bristow resolution nothing will be done until it does go, travels through the Territory at Government expense, gets back, and has its secretary write up some sort of a report.

This article was written apparently by one Ashmun Brown. I desire to say that I never introduced any such resolution in the Committee on Territories and no such resolution has ever been introduced by any member of the committee, so far as I know. No such action was ever taken by the committee at any time, and there is no truth in the statement made.

I simply make the statement to correct this erroneous report because acquaintances of mine in the West have sent different newspaper clippings to me inquiring why I am opposed to legislation for Alaska, and the clippings are made up largely from information which this paper has assumed to give, which is absolutely false.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Stratham, N. H., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Manchester, N. H., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Rev. P. T. Rowé, bishop of Alaska, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide medical and sanitary relief for the natives of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation to maintain the present water rates in the District, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAPP (for Mr. LA FOLLETTE) presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Arena, Wis., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (for Mr. LA FOLLETTE) presented resolutions adopted by the Progressive League, of Chippewa Falls, Wis., remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on sugar, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRONNA presented petitions of members of the Civic League and of sundry physicians of Mandan, N. Dak., and of the Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs, praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SANDERS presented a memorial of Paris Division, No. 575, Order Railway Conductors of America, of Paris, Tenn., remonstrating against the passage of the employers' liability and workmen's compensation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of M. L. McConnell Post, No. 91, Department of Tennessee, Grand Army of the Republic, of Maryville, Tenn., remonstrating against the incorporation of the Grand Army of the Republic, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PENROSE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Tamaqua and Reading, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of Local Union No. 484, Cigar Makers' International Union of America, of Meriden, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the use of trading coupons, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of New Haven Lodge, No. 21, Order of B'rith Abraham, of New Haven, Conn., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called literacy test amendment to the immigration law, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROOT presented memorials of sundry citizens of Fort Edward, Gowanda, Livonia, Mount Vernon, and Syracuse, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Owen medical bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of 36 physicians of Rhode Island, praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES presented memorials of sundry citizens of North Yakima, Little Rock, Toppenish, Ellensburg, Cowiche, and Colville, all in the State of Washington, remonstrating against the establishment of a department of public health, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bremerton, Everett, Seattle, Tacoma, and Olympia, all in the State of Washington, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the use of trading coupons, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. O'GORMAN presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Batavia, N. Y., remonstrating against any change being made in the patent laws, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) making provision for the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 22340) to regulate foreign commerce by prohibiting the admission into the United States of certain adulterated seeds and seeds unfit for seeding purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5069) to promote the efficiency of the enlisted personnel of the United States Navy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 783) thereon.

DECORATION FROM ITALIAN GOVERNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably with amendments the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 105) authorizing Surg. Eugene Wasdin, United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, to accept a decoration tendered him by the Italian Government, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Foreign Relations were, in line 7, before the word "Surgeon," to insert "the said," and in the same line, after the name "Wasdin," to strike out "as he is now deceased," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, authorized to accept from the Italian Government the decoration tendered Surg. Eugene Wasdin, United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and to deliver same to the widow of the said Surg. Wasdin.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of State, for and on behalf of Surg. Eugene Wasdin, late of the United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, to accept a decoration tendered him by the Italian Government, and to present the same to the widow of the said Surg. Wasdin."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 6919) to amend Subchapter II of Chapter XIX of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 6920) granting a pension to Minnie A. Thornhill (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 6921) granting a pension to Deborah H. Riggs (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 6922) granting a pension to Melissa Gross (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP (for Mr. LA FOLLETTE):

A bill (S. 6923) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Braun (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 6924) granting an increase of pension to Jennie Bassett (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 6925) to authorize the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas:

A bill (S. 6926) to convey to the Big Rock Stone & Construction Co. a portion of the military reservation of Fort Logan H. Roots in the State of Arkansas; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 6927) for the improvement of the foreign service; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (S. 6928) to authorize the Secretary of War to recognize the services of Dr. John T. Nagle as a medical officer, who was employed as such during the Civil War by authority of the Revised United States Army Regulations of 1863, and who performed the duties of a medical officer agreeably to Army regulations; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ASSAY OFFICE, ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. REED (for Mr. STONE) submitted an amendment proposing to establish an assay office at St. Louis, Mo., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 24023), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT OF NATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

Mr. BURTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 316), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 500 additional copies of the final report of the United States National Waterways Commission.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC ISLANDS AND PORTO RICO.

Mr. CLAPP. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration. I will state that in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, as acting chairman I held a short hearing, and I find that the usual resolution had not been passed authorizing the payment of the stenographer. So I have had this resolution date back to the beginning of the session. I do not apprehend that there will be many hearings, but it is to cover all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 317) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time as may be necessary to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee during the Sixty-second Congress, and to have the same printed for its use; and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. This resolution to take effect from the beginning of the present session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that under the statute the resolution has to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly. Of course I have no objection to the reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to that committee.

Mr. CLAPP. All there is to it is that the bill must remain unpaid until authority is given to sign a voucher.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, at the close of the routine morning business to-morrow I desire to submit some observations on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 109) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—the joint resolution which I introduced and which lies on the table.

LOSS OF STEAMSHIP "TITANIC."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, immediately after the morning business has been disposed of, the subcommittee appointed to investigate the causes leading up to the disaster of the steamship Titanic will make its report, and I should like to make some observations thereon.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH COLOMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 693).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the Senate's resolution of March 1, 1912, requesting the President "if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence and communications between this Government and the Government of Colombia since the last presentation to the Senate of such correspondence and communications to this date," I transmit a report by the Secretary of State on the subject.

I concur in the conclusion reached by the Secretary of State that the public interest would not be conserved by the transmission to the Senate at the present time of further correspondence and communications between this Government and the Government of Colombia upon matters relating to Panama.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 22, 1912.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of May 16, 1912, the House of Representatives concurring, I return herewith House bill No. 14083, entitled "An act to create a new division of the southern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Corpus Christi, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes."

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 22, 1912.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 18041. An act granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

"TITANIC" DISASTER.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, following the remarks of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and the presentation of the committee's report, I will, subject to the convenience of the Senate, submit some remarks upon the lessons taught Congress and the people by the Titanic disaster.

EIGHT-HOUR LABOR LAW.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 9061.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9061) limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory, or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. BORAH. The amendment which was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts provides for a 48-hour week instead of an 8-hour day. I do not desire to discuss the matter any further than to say that, in my opinion, it would destroy the effectiveness of this measure as we understand it and as the committee reported it.

I am willing that the amendment shall go to a vote without taking further time of the Senate upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Idaho if the bill does not absolutely prevent the granting of a half holiday by manufacturing concerns that are doing Government work.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; it will not prevent it. They can arrange for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. How can they arrange for it if you are going to have a hard and fast 8-hour day? Will the Senator tell me how it can be done?

Mr. BORAH. I think that they can have an 8-hour day and still have a portion of a day for holiday. There is nothing to prevent them from working less than 8 hours.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is, you propose to give the employees that half holiday; they receive no pay for it? Is that the notion?

Mr. BORAH. That might be the way in which it could be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. The employers might, of course, give them half of a week and pay them for a full week, or give them all the week for that matter. I do not know but that we are coming to that. It has been suggested in this debate that in addition to a rigid 8-hour day a Saturday half holiday is inevitable. Possibly we are in danger of doing violence to the laboring men themselves, because it seems to me that we are going to get this matter into such a shape that they will be the losers rather than the gainers by the operation. I pass the Union Station almost every evening, and I find men working there at 10 o'clock on the Columbus statue. I suppose somebody has taken a Government contract to build that monument, and this law would prevent those men from completing that statue except under 8-hour conditions.

It does seem to me that in justice to the men who are taking contracts from the Government there ought to be some consideration given them, and that they ought not to be put to every possible inconvenience in the matter of conducting their business.

In the State of Massachusetts, and I believe in some other States, the laboring men are given a half holiday. They make it up on the other five days of the week. To say that those concerns shall not grant their employees that half holiday without paying them for it or without the employees being willing to lose their wages to that extent, which I am sure they would not be, it looks to me like a hardship we ought not to impose on men who take work from the Government.

Mr. BORAH. If that were the present custom or the universal practice, there would be great force in the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire, but it pertains to only a few industries and to a few localities. The general principle upon which the bill is built outweighs in moment, in my judgment, the importance of acceding to a few instances.

Besides, I am satisfied that, generally speaking, it is better that the day be confined to an 8-hour day and the Saturday afternoon be waived than that workmen should be compelled to labor more than 8 hours a day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I happen to be one Senator who during a very important period of my life was able to work 16 hours a day, and if any man had stepped in at that time or if the Government of the United States had stepped in, if it could have done so, and said that I should work only 8 hours a day, I should have considered that man or that Government an enemy of mine. If we are going to legislate that no man shall be permitted under any circumstances to work more than 8 hours a day, why might we not with equal consistency say that every man shall be compelled to work 16 hours a day? If the Government can do the one thing, why can it not do the other? To my mind this is legislation that is not justifiable or called for.

I have a good many letters from workingmen who say that they do not want this legislation; that they have not asked for it. It is being asked for by men drawing large salaries from the workingmen, by men who sit in high places looking down on our legislative bodies and holding us responsible for our votes. I am not one of those who have ever allowed those men to dictate to me.

I had hoped that the Senator from Idaho, who is so fair-minded, would permit this amendment to be made, because it is an absolute absurdity for any man to say that it is a detriment to a man to work 9 hours a day when he is working only 48 hours in the entire week. It would be a great accommodation not to a few but to very many. Very likely a half holiday will become more nearly universal than the Senator is aware of if this is permitted in the bill. I am very much disappointed that the Senator insists that we must have this hard and fast rule, and that if a young man ambitious to get an education not only is willing but is anxious to work overtime to obtain a little added money to enable him to get an education, the strong arm of the Government shall come in and say "You shall not be 'permitted' to work one minute over 8 hours a day, and if the concern allows you to do that, the concern shall be punished by heavy penalties as a result." To my mind it is not good legislation.

Then, again, I want to ask the Senator this question: This bill goes beyond the contractor; it takes in the subcontractor, the sub-subcontractor, and perhaps the sub-sub-subcontractor; and the man who takes the work from the Government is held responsible under fines and penalties if one of these subcontractors or sub-sub-subcontractors permits a man to work a minute over 8 hours. Does the Senator from Idaho really think that that is very good legislation?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can answer the Senator from New Hampshire—in view of the fact that he has asked the question a number of times, "Does the Senator really think"?—that if the Senator did not "really think" that it was good legislation the Senator would not be urging it upon the floor of this Senate. I may be greatly in error in regard to this problem; I am only submitting this bill and this report as the representative of this committee, representing our judgment and our views in regard to it. We have examined the matter with some detail; we have considered it to a very great extent; we believe that it is sound legislation; and we have the support in that belief of a great many people who are engaged in large industries. Some people who are employers of labor, as the reports show, have said that it is not only well for the man who toils, but it is better for the man who is directing the employment to engage a man for 8 hours a day. It is upon that theory that the bill is framed, and it is presented in good faith in the belief that it is sound legislation.

So far as the subcontractor is concerned, there is no difficulty in the general contractor protecting himself as against the subcontractor, because that may be done by contract between the contractor and the subcontractor. It is simply a question of contract, beginning with the original contractor and running to the ultimate contractor, whoever he may be.

If there is no contract, then there is no liability; and if there is a contract, there is the power to protect by covering in the contract between the contractor and subcontractor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Supposing the subcontractor made a contract with the contractor, and the subcontractor was an irresponsible man?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are unable to hear over here, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. My suggestion was, supposing the contractor should make a contract with a subcontractor, and the subcontractor was an irresponsible man, then I suppose the contractor would be held in fines and penalties, because of a failure of the subcontractor to meet his obligations. Is not that so?

Mr. BORAH. That might arise in some instances by reason of business carelessness, by reason of a failure of the contractor to contract with a safe subcontractor; but it would not often arise, and it would very seldom arise if this bill were enacted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, the Senator has said he is ready to vote, and I have no disposition to delay a vote; in fact, I am very anxious to get a vote on every measure that is before the Senate, because I think the longer we stay here the more harm we are likely to do to the people of the country. For that reason I am anxious to get away. This is but one measure, among others, that we have got to encounter. We are to be asked to destroy the principle of injunction before we get through here, and I suppose we have got to tear up pretty nearly all the foundations of all those great principles that we have always thought were desirable for a Government such as ours. Now, the Senator is insisting upon a hard-and-fast 8-hour day, and that no laborer shall be permitted to work a minute over 8 hours.

A very distinguished gentleman in another body declared only a short time ago that in his judgment 6 hours are long enough for any man to labor, and that no man ought to be permitted to labor more than 6 hours. I suppose that is what we shall come to here next, and I presume that when it comes to us under the snap of the whip of the men who are drawing large salaries from these poor men we shall have to surrender to their views; at least, I imagine that the majority of Congress will surrender, as it is apparently willing to do under this proposed law, which I regard as a very vicious proposition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has not undertaken to locate any whip, but there have been several "snaps" in regard to this bill besides those used by the men who represent labor in this matter. It would be equally interesting to discuss the other side of the question if it were at all relevant; but it is not. I assume that the Senator from New Hampshire and other Senators will vote according to their convictions, and they ought to be courteous enough and generous enough to concede that the Senators who are supporting this bill will do the same thing.

Mr. President, I want to read, in view of the intimation that this bill is being put through under the lash and for demagogic reasons, a few paragraphs from those who I am sure the Senator from New Hampshire respects. This bill has been in its principles before the Senate for many years; it has been now under discussion off and on for about 20 years; it has not moved with unseemly haste to its conclusion. It has been debated by men whose intellectual character and standing and patriotism are not subject to question. Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, when this bill in principle was on one occasion before the Senate, said:

> This proposition of political economy, whether wise or foolish, whether the proposition be demagogism or the opposition to it is shallow-pated assurance, is one which comes from a source where demagogism is not often found. Such profound thinkers as John Stuart Mill, such practical reasoners as Thomas B. Macaulay were among the early advocates of this doctrine in the manufacturing legislation of England, and it is a doctrine which has made its way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Idaho if that was not said in reference to the 8-hour law which we already have on the statute books?

Mr. BORAH. It was said in regard to the 8-hour principle.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and we have that incorporated in our statutes now, but not in the form proposed in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. We have it incorporated in the statutes. What Senator Hoar was discussing was the fact that the words "or permitted" were to be stricken out of the law, therefore rendering the law inefficient and ineffective. So he was discussing pointedly and clearly the precise question which we are here discussing to-day; that is, whether or not it was the duty of the Government, and it was wise legislation, to enforce specifically an 8-hour day. Mr. Hoar continued:

The same kind of speech which the Senator from Connecticut thinks it courteous to indulge in here in regard to opinions which differ from his own was made by the friends of the old English factory system when it was endeavored to put an end to the labor of children and women in factories who worked 15, 16, or 17 hours in the day, and the same discussion and the same contest and the same opposing and conflicting reasonings were heard as the time of the day's work of the laboring men in manufacturing, mining, and other mechanical occupations in this country and in Europe gradually came down from 16 to 15, 14, 12, 11, and now it has reached 10 and is coming to 8 hours a day. It is a principle which stands on solid ground both of reason and experience.

The experience of mankind has shown that where the workingmen of an intelligent and instructed country work faithfully for 8 hours a day in most of the mechanical occupations and have the remainder of their time for intercourse with their families, for reading, for learning their political duties, for attending lyceums and lectures, for resorting to the public libraries and social meetings, they are not only better workers of the country of which they are citizens, but they turn out more work as the result in the manufacturing employment to which their lives are given. You have instead of the tired, worn-out jade going to his home, with every faculty of brain and body worn out and fatigued, a skillful, inventive, thoughtful, reflecting brain. You have good citizenship in a man whose leisure is one of the luxuries of life, one almost of the necessities of life to a healthy and educated brain.

As I said before, this experiment has been tried and its results recorded. It is the opinion of some of the most thoughtful and intelligent employers of labor as well as of the representatives of the workingmen, and it has been desired that this experiment should be tried, not to be left to individual manufacturers who are conducting their business in constant competition and strife with others, but that it should be tried in behalf alike of the labor and the manufacture of the country by the Government, and whether it be right or wrong that the Government should try it in its capacity of a large employer of labor. It is the law of the land, and what Senator will rise here in his place and say that this law should not be faithfully, honestly, liberally, and fairly construed and executed?

I read also from a speech delivered by the late President McKinley in the House of Representatives while the same subject was under discussion:

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill. It has been said that it is a bill to limit the opportunity of the workingman to gain a livelihood. This is not so; it will have the opposite effect. So far as the Government of the United States, as an employer, is concerned, in the limitation for a day's work provided in this bill to 8 hours, instead of putting any limitation upon the opportunity of the American freemen to earn a living it increases and enlarges the opportunity for the workingman to earn a living. [Applause.] Eight hours, under the laws of the United States, constitute a day's work. That law has been on our statute books for 20 or more years.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Since 1868.

Mr. McKINLEY. They say around me that it has been on our statute books for 22 years. In all these years it has been "the word of promise to the ear," but by the Government of the United States it has been "broken to the hope." [Applause.] The Government and its officials should be swift to execute and enforce its own laws, and failure in this particular is most reprehensible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered that when we constitute 8 hours a day's work instead of 10 hours every 4 days give an additional day's work to some workingman who may not have any employment at all. [Applause.] It is one more day's work, one more day's wages, one more opportunity for work and wages, an increased demand for labor. I am in favor of this bill as it is amended by the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McComas].

It applies now only to the labor of men's hands. It applies only to their work. It does not apply to material; it does not apply to transportation. It only applies to the actual labor, skilled or unskilled, employed on public works and in the execution of the contracts of the Government. And the Government of the United States ought finally and in good faith to set this example of 8 hours as constituting a day's work required of laboring men in the service of the United States. [Applause.] The tendency of the times the world over is for shorter hours for labor, shorter hours in the interest of health, shorter hours in the interest of humanity, shorter hours in the interest of the home and the family; and the United States can do no better service to labor and to its own citizens than to set the example to States, to corporations, and to individuals employing men by declaring that, so far as the Government is concerned, 8 hours shall constitute a day's work and be all that is required of its laboring force. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I shall support and vote for this measure. I do not believe that the God of humanity breathed the breath of life into man that he should live to work, but rather that he should work that he might live. The whole purpose of civilization, not only in this country, but in other lands, is to lighten the burdens of toil, both through invention and by limiting the hours of toil. We each year expend millions of dollars for public parks, for libraries, for art galleries, for museums, and the like. Of what purpose or value are all these, I ask, if in humanity's struggle for bread and butter men have no time to profit by and enjoy them?

Mr. President, 8 hours for toil, 8 hours for rest, and 8 hours for recreation is an unwritten law that has passed into a proverb. Defeat this measure and we put forth the fiat and declaration that we stand for work for mankind from the day he leaves his cradle to the day he enters his grave.

All experience demonstrates that shorter hours for labor give better results, both for the employee and the employer. I say, as an employer and as a laborer—for I have been both—that the 8-hour system tends to make better workmen and infinitely better citizens.

Mr. President, on all sides we are urging steps and legislation that may tend to deter the huddling of large numbers of our population in close quarters. The cry, "Back to the soil; closer to nature!" is the slogan of the day. Carry this thought out and it will make stronger and more healthful bodies, keener and brighter intellects—in a word, better men and women. Long hours of toil will make this impossible; shorter hours of toil will do more to vacate so-called slums than anything else I know of. Shorter hours in workshop and mill will make the waste and barren spots of the landscape blossom as the rose.

The charge is often made that the additional hours of leisure or rest will be spent by workmen in dissipation and revelry. History proves to the contrary. The Saturday half holiday is a complete refutation of this charge. An overfatigued and weary body will seek stimulation in some form or other, and too often alcoholic stimulant is sought. The saloon is only an incident. Low wages, long hours, intolerable conditions lie at the bottom of the evil of intemperance and vice. Less and lighter exactions in mill and workshop and more of God's open, free air will do more for the cause of sobriety, good order, and good citizenship than anything I know of. The shortening of the hours of labor mark the advance of civilization the world over. Mr. President, let this, the giant Republic of the world, take the initial step in this advance.

At the hearings before the Committee on Education and Labor, of which I have the honor to be a member, with almost entire unanimity employers freely admitted that the conditions proposed in this measure were sure to come. They had seen them approach for years.

Mr. President, I beg further to state that the hearings before the committee were both extensive and exhaustive, and this report and bill to-day are a reflection of the honest judgment and conscience of the committee.

Further, I believe that to pass this measure will meet with almost universal approbation and approval. The average workingman scarcely sees his family, except on Sundays. During the week he must rise before 6 o'clock in order to reach his work for the day. In the evening, when he reaches his home, the family have retired; and so each working day repeats the history of the day before.

Senators, pass this bill. It is in the interest of better workmen; it is in the interest of humanity—yes, it is in the interest of happier and better citizens.

In response to the thought expressed by the Senator from New Hampshire I say that many employees appeared before this committee and said the only difficulty was that the unit they had was too short. In answer to that thought I suggested that an amendment might be made that no employer shall employ or cause any employee in his employ to work any hours longer than 48 hours a week, and that no single day should be longer than 8 hours. The argument was used that in the mills, where they use great ladles, in the event of having reached a certain point in production the residue would chill the next day and be absolutely destroyed. Hence the proposition that I suggested, that it might be no longer than 48 hours a week and the unit no longer than 8 hours a day.

You can not legislate for a half holiday at all. The half holiday in this country is not the result of legislation, but it is the result of the conscientious and persistent insistence of the laboring organizations of this country. I believe to pass this measure would be a step in the direction of humanity. In all justice I believe it would do the employer no harm. In my own city, in the State of New Jersey, masons, painters, carpenters, and all mechanics are paid for 8 hours, and the workingman has derived better results, a better life, and better existence.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the State of New Jersey have you a law that prevents a man from working a few minutes over 8 hours if he wishes to do so?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. We have not that, but most of the thrifty mechanics in the State of New Jersey almost unanimously are members of trade organizations, and that exaction is quite generally in force.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the fact is they can work over 8 hours a day if they desire, as a great many workmen want to do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is true; but I think we are fast going beyond that condition. I can recall full well when every mechanic, every carpenter, every mason, and the like came to work at 7 o'clock and did not cease work until 7 o'clock. I then recall when the condition was changed to 6 o'clock for closing, and 6 o'clock finally became the hour, and then 5 o'clock, and then it went on until it is 8 o'clock when they go to work. And the fresh workman, freed from overfatigue, accomplishes more in 8 hours and is in better condition to meet his duties. Pray God, is there not something more in life than the mere matter of dollars? Man should have the splendid advantage of our civilization, and can not we give him, pray heaven, a little more leisure that he may have an opportunity to cultivate his mind and to participate in the blessings of his own household? And I believe that the Senator from New Hampshire, in common with those who advocate this measure, will hold up their hands to high heaven in gratification that we have taken a step in this direction.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not quite willing to concede to the kind-hearted and lovable Senator from New Jersey greater concern for the workingman than the rest of us entertain.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not claim that; but I do realize that in some sections of the country we have progressed in a direction, in the way of labor, that has not been reached by some other portions of our country. As I live, I am not pleading as a demagogue; I am not here pleading as the advocate of any special interest, but as a citizen who in his early days was an employee and a workman and a laborer, and who has later been placed so that he has in his employ hundreds of men. I plead both as an employer and as an employee. I plead for a better condition for the workingman. I plead for an opportunity for our workingmen and working women to leave our shops and to leave our manufacturing establishments earlier, that they may enjoy God's green acre; that they may enjoy the blessings of outdoor life.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some of the rest of us have had the luxury of being employees and not the luxury of being employers of labor, and very likely we have a reasonably clear comprehension of the interests of the laboring man. The Senator pays a high tribute to his own State. But I have been reading during the past few years of some very troublesome happenings in the State of New Jersey, and I do not think it is very much to the credit of that State that it is the headquarters of anarchy in this country, as it seems to be.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I must reluctantly admit that that condition has prevailed——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But be it said to the eternal disgrace of America that she has put upon the statute books a system of laws that has made those conditions possible.

Mr. GALLINGER. What laws are they?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I refer to the iniquitous and cursed system of taxation; your intolerable tariff taxation. Laugh as you may. It will take many years yet before you will convince the average workingman that by taxing him you are doing him good.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Your process of tariff in mill and workshop in Passaic and Paterson has resulted in a handful of millionaires, who have gotten rich on the system, and yet we have the other people living in squalor; and why? That has bred anarchism and has bred a condition of things that we are seeking our way out of each day through the enlightenment of the public against the accursed system.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not enter into the discussion of the tariff to-day. That will come on another bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is a different proposition——

Mr. GALLINGER. That question will be up at 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am only answering you——

Mr. GALLINGER. But I want to say to my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, that when he seeks to destroy the policy of protection in the United States, his farm, which has been cut up into house lots to be occupied by industrious people—that if he succeeds in destroying protection, he will have a blackberry patch instead of a happy and prosperous community.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I know what we would have done without the tariff. God knows——

Mr. GALLINGER. We know. The Senator says God knows. I will ask the Senator from New Jersey, who has such a deep and abiding interest in the workingmen of the country and who wants them to have the opportunity to see the green fields and listen to the singing of birds and the babbling of brooks, if he thinks it would not be a very good thing to permit men who desire to do so to have a half holiday on Saturday? That privilege is denied him under this bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator need give himself no concern about the Saturday half holiday. The workingmen will attend to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. They can not under this bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They will attend to it through the ordinary channels of the trade-unions.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have already yielded to the Senator from New Jersey. I will yield to the Senator from New York if I have the opportunity.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire where is the provision in the pending bill which would prevent the workingman who desires a half holiday on Saturday from arranging for it amicably with his employer?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no provision of that kind, provided he is willing to forego his pay. But the benevolent Senator from New Jersey does not agree to that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not want that to happen.

Mr. O'GORMAN. As I read the bill, there is no provision against the mechanic and his employer making any amicable arrangement they see fit to make with respect to the half holiday on Saturday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the statute we are considering there will be 6 days of labor, with 8 hours on each day, absolutely without variation or the shadow of turning.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The proposed statute says that no workingman who is engaged on Government work or on work intended for Government use shall be employed in excess of 8 hours a day. But he may be employed for 6 or 4 or any other number of hours a day not exceeding 8 that he and his employer may agree upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New York knows too much of human nature and trade conditions to hold to the view that the workingman would be willing to give up some of the pay he is now receiving, based on the 8-hour principle.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I want to say——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Jersey alleges that they now live in squalor and want and deprivation, and, of course, they will not give a part of their present earnings.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let me say——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I simply wish to observe that in the State of New York, where we have a larger number of workingmen than can be found in any other State of the Union, the policy embraced in the pending bill has been in operation for several years to the advantage and satisfaction of capital as well as of labor. There is nothing new in the pending bill when compared with the legislation which has been in force in the State of New York for years, although I gathered from the observations of the Senator a moment ago that he knew of no precedents in the legislation of this country for the legislation contemplated by this act. If this is the Senator's belief, it is surely unfounded.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho that the adoption of this proposed amendment would tend to emasculate the best feature of the act, and while I believe that the Senator proposing the amendment has no such desire, I can well understand how the Members of this body who are opposed to the amelioration of labor contemplated by this legislation may confuse and complicate the issue by injecting the proposed amendment making it optional as to whether a man shall work 8 or 9 hours a day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator permit me to answer?

Mr. GALLINGER. With great pleasure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator from Vermont charges——

Mr. GALLINGER. No; the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They are contiguous States and both are very delightful, and only those two States could produce such splendid specimens of humanity as represent them here.

Mr. GALLINGER. Thank you. We will welcome the Senator to our beautiful State when he comes in search of the babbling brooks and singing birds and the green fields he speaks of, and we will show the Senator the beauties of protection also.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That will be very nice, and I know I will be thoroughly satisfied with them and the bigness of your heart.

I say for the little Commonwealth of New Jersey, in answer to the Senator, that while I do not say our people live in squalor, I do say it is unfortunate for the Senator's argument when he cites the cities of Passaic and Paterson, where he says anarchists grow up or seem to emanate and spring up, for those conditions are the evils of the tariff system. Those workingmen and those working women in Paterson and Passaic work in the mills and the workshops for a pittance—65 and 70 cents a day between a white woman and starvation; and they are in your protected industries. In Boundbrook from 65 to 80 cents a day between a white woman and ruin, poverty, and shame. That is the blessing that comes to them.

You speak of my home. As I had occasion to say earlier, when I first came here, my farm has been built up, and I have built it up largely myself, but I have built it up with unprotected American labor. I have paid in American dollars and not in stock or watered capital. I have paid masons $4 to $4.50 a day; painters, $4 a day. They are unprotected. Find me somewhere under your protective system in Vermont or Massachusetts or New Hampshire or anywhere else within the confines of this splendid domain those who do half as well. Your argument makes paupers and rags and millionaires.

Mr. GALLINGER. Our argument is the opposite of the English and of the English system. Many of the people who are working in Passaic and Paterson for this pittance that the Senator suggests went there from a country that has not any tariff laws and where labor is not paid 50 per cent of the wages paid in Paterson and Passaic. That is the fact; and I would point the Senator to the condition of squalor that exists in England to-day, so far as its workingmen are concerned.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let me point you to Bethlehem.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right. We are willing to take the responsibility of that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GALLINGER. I always like to hear the Senator from Missouri discuss a public question from the Democratic standpoint.

Mr. REED. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that when they had the corn laws in England——

Mr. GALLINGER. That was before my time.

Mr. REED. And other restrictions the people got neither 65 cents a day nor 25 cents a day. They were starving by the wayside, and they had to take down their tariff barriers in order to get food for the people of England to eat.

So, if he wants to contrast so-called free-trade England with protected conditions in this country, he might also go back and contrast protected England with the present condition.

Mr. GALLINGER. I might go back——

Mr. REED. Just a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I might go back to the plague of locusts in Egypt or the famine in Ireland. But I am talking about present conditions.

Mr. REED. Out of those two conditions in England he might draw a lesson that would lead to the conclusion that possibly something besides the tariff has to do with the contrast between England and this country. I do not want the Senator to go back to the plagues of Egypt, although his tariff system has been compared by a great statesman to the plagues of Egypt, and the language was something like this: "These monopolists sip with us in our dish, filch from our pockets, and, like the lice of Egypt, are found in every home." So he might go back even to the plagues of Egypt.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had no doubt the Senator would discuss the question of vermin before he got through. I do not know what statesman it was who compared our tariff system to the plagues of Egypt. I wish the Senator would tell us who he was. I would like to look him up.

Mr. REED. Lord Culpeper.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, that was a good while ago. And was he talking about the tariff system of the United States?

Mr. REED. It was not much longer ago than you began building monopolies through the tariff system and calling them infant industries.

Mr. GALLINGER. And about that time they had a good many monopolies in England, too, and they have had a great many created since.

Mr. REED. Yes; and he was fighting them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I regret that the tariff question has been injected into this discussion. I know how the laboring people, as a rule, feel about the protective system. If we are ever going to have a referendum on anything, I wish we might have a referendum on that very question, submitting it to the men in the manufacturing industries of the United States; and I think the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from New Jersey would be satisfied that they are doing those people an injustice when they are picturing them as being in squalor, rags, and destitution. It is not true. There are millions of dollars in the savings banks of New England put there by men and women who work in our mills and factories. They work in our mills, and they do not relish having their condition pictured as it has been pictured on this floor time and time again.

Mr. President, we were talking about permitting the laboring men to have a half holiday on Saturday if they desire it, not to increase their hours of labor during the week, but to let them work, if they are willing to work and want to work, as many of them do, 9 hours a day for 5 days and 3 hours on Saturday. So it seems that when a workman came to me a few days ago and said, "Of course, nobody would object to it," I was not far out of the way when I said, "Yes; honorable Senators will object to it, and the probability is that it will be defeated." Prepared for its defeat as I am, yet I want to reiterate what I presume I have already repeated—that in the interests of the laboring men, in the interests of their homes and their happiness, they ought to be permitted the privilege of having a half holiday on Saturday if they desire it; and I believe it is not only a hardship but a wrong to enact any legislation that will deny them that privilege, which many of them so much desire.

Mr. President, at a later time in this discussion, because we are not going to complete it to-day, I may have something to say on the general propositions involved in the bill, but I have said all I care to say about this Saturday half-holiday matter.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not care to be carried off on the waves of a tariff debate, but the Senator from New Jersey spoke about the unprotected trades, and I thought perhaps it would not be amiss to call his attention to a statement made before the Committee on Finance by Mr. Frank R. Vreeland, of Bayonne, N. J., representing the executive board of the New Jersey State Building Trades. He was asked:

What do you mean by "the building trades"? Just what trades are included?

Mr. VREELAND. Carpenters, painters, plumbers, sheet-metal workers, marble cutters, bricklayers, plasterers, electrical workers, and building-trades mechanics and laborers in general.

He began by stating that there were 30,000 members of unions which he represented.

Senator WILLIAMS. Carpenters?

Mr. VREELAND. Carpenters; yes, sir.

Senator WILLIAMS. Bricklayers?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes, sir; the entire class of labor employed in the erection of buildings, from the excavation to the locking of the front door.

We feel, as an organization, that while this revision of the tariff does not affect any of the building material in its handling by us on the building, yet it does have the effect of creating an unrest among the employers and stagnation in business, as it were, because of the uncertainty as to the result of the tariff revision; and that directly affects us or those affiliated with us.

His testimony goes on at some length, in which he objected strongly to the reduction.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. He was simply an employee in common with the rest of us. His condition is no different from yours or mine, or that of anybody else.

Mr. LODGE. I only quoted it to show that the man came down here—a member of the executive board of the building trades, composed of 30,000 men—and he took a different view from the Senator from New Jersey of the effect of the tariff on his unprotected industry.

Mr. President, I come from a State in which the first efforts were made in this country for the limitation of the hours of labor. We passed, 60 or 70 years ago, an act on the model of the early factory acts of England, which have been referred to, to limit the hours of labor. We have continued that policy in my State; we have kept on reducing the hours of labor in the mills, until we have the number of hours per week now lower than they are anywhere else.

I am far from opposed to the principle of the bill. I believe there should be a proper regulation of hours for those who it may be said generally, in certain great organized businesses, are unable to make the proper arrangements for themselves. I have no desire to impair the principle of the bill for a proper regulation of the hours of labor. But in my State the Saturday half holiday has been very generally adopted; it is almost universal.

The Senator from Idaho spoke of the people interested in this thing being a negligible quantity and the practice confined to a few States. Of course we each of us look at it a little from our own point of view. My State is a very small State, indeed. It could easily be put into a single county in Idaho. But there are three and one-half million people employed in that little territory. The annual product of the industries of Massachusetts has reached $1,400,000,000 in a year. The working people of the State have some $700,000,000 in the savings banks. The number of people employed directly in the industries, the people who work in them—not those who are dependent on them or who are concerned with the overhead management of the business, but the people actually employed in the industries—number between 500,000 and 600,000. However negligible and trivial that may seem to some Senators from larger States, it is of course naturally of importance to me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Massachusetts, I am sure, did not understand me as speaking disparagingly of Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I did not, of course.

Mr. BORAH. I simply referred to the fact that it has not been a universal custom or practice, and that as compared with the entire question it is, in my judgment, unimportant.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am utterly unable to see how this amendment injures the bill. The Saturday half-holiday system is, as I said, in general use in my State. I think it is very largely used in other States, but of that I have no immediate knowledge. The Senator from Missouri the other day referred to it as if it was familiar in his State; the Senator from Tennessee spoke of it as known in his State; and I have no doubt that it is in general use and is coming into very universal adoption everywhere.

Now, if we limit the number of hours in the week days—what this 8-hour bill does—to 48, the workman will be forced naturally either to the point, where the payment is by hours, as it is in most great industries, of giving up 4 hours of work in the week, losing pay for that time, or else abandoning his half holiday.

It does seem to me it can not affect the principle of the bill at all to allow a certain amount of latitude, a latitude sufficient to give at least to the workmen and the employers alike the opportunity of choice. If a man prefers, as I think most men would, to work 9 hours for 5 days and 3 hours on Saturday, so as to have practically the whole of that day and Sunday together to go in the country or indulge in any rational amusements that appeal to him, it seems to me it is not a very large liberty to give him. I know that the workmen in my State very generally desire that. I believe they would be entirely satisfied with the 48 hours' limit. They are accustomed to the weekly limit, and if it is limited to 48 hours the right might be left to them to say how it should be distributed. The amendment is not offered with any intention of emasculating the bill or anything of the kind. It is offered simply to allow a certain latitude to the people who are working under this legislation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Did I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the present limit in Massachusetts is 54 hours a week?

Mr. LODGE. That applies to the textile mills.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But not to the navy yards?

Mr. LODGE. The navy yards, of course, have been under the 8-hour law for a long time. This bill does not touch navy yards.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should say the shipbuilding yards where naval work is done for the Government.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether the 54-hour law applies to the shipbuilding yards or not. The shipbuilding yards, however, I will say to the Senator, I do not think are working 54 hours a week, anyway.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was going to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts how he can possibly hope to harmonize his amendment providing for a total of 48 hours a week with the Massachusetts law, which provides for 54 hours?

Mr. LODGE. I do not expect to harmonize it with it. Those great textile mills are not concerned, or very few of them. There is hardly one in the State that takes a Government contract. They would not be affected by this measure at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As a matter of fact, if the textile mills allow a Saturday half holiday and provide for a total of 54 hours a week they must be working 10 hours a day, and that is not a very fine model to present to us.

Mr. LODGE. I am not presenting it as a model. The adjoining States work as high as 56 and 60 hours a week. If the Senator will look over the textile industries of this country he will find 54 hours the lowest week.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator whether he does not think it is deplorable that in the textile industries, protected as they are by the tariff on the theory that it is for the benefit of American labor, the employees should work such excessive hours?

Mr. LODGE. I think the hours of labor in many of the industries are very long.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Particularly in the protected industries.

Mr. LODGE. No; not particularly in the protected industries.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been shown, and it is a fact, that in unprotected industries, which have no benefit of the protective tariff, they work only 8 hours.

Mr. LODGE. They have no need of a protective tariff, because they have a natural prohibitory tariff. You can not import a house built.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. You can import men.

Mr. LODGE. You can import men, and there is too much competition from imported men.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that this is not a law to prohibit men from working more than 8 hours a day; it is an act to provide that work done for the United States Government shall be done upon an 8-hour basis, just as any employer can provide that anyone working for him shall work upon the 8-hour basis.

Mr. LODGE. I have grasped that idea in the bill. I have grasped that its idea was to have 8 hours on work contracted for by the United States. The object was only to give those industries—I confess the shipyard was what I had chiefly in mind—the opportunity to make the half holiday and yet obey the law. The employers are making no resistance to the law that I am aware of, but they do ask for that latitude in making the arrangement.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts in which States workingmen are permitted to work 56 hours a week?

Mr. LODGE. I think it is the 56-hour law in Rhode Island, and I think in New Hampshire, too. In Pennsylvania I think they have the 56-hour law. All those laws represent successive reductions. The last law we passed was a reduction from 56 to 54 hours.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think there is any 54-hour law in Pennsylvania. There may be in New Hampshire, but I do not think there is any in Pennsylvania.

Mr. LODGE. I am not speaking altogether of the law. If the Senator will go to the States where there is no law fixing the hours he will find it runs as high as 60 hours a week.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I speak with considerable certainty when I say that the law in New Hampshire is 54 hours.

Mr. LODGE. Then it is the same as ours; there has been a reduction.

Mr. GALLINGER. There was a reduction a few years ago.

Mr. LODGE. There are some States, the Senator will observe, if he will look at the statistics, where there are no laws limiting the hours of labor in a week, which go far over 54 hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think in justice to myself and perhaps in justice to others I ought to make a statement.

I stated day before yesterday that I favored the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and gave my reasons for favoring it. Among those reasons was the opinion that it was in form desired by the laboring men who were concerned. I have since been advised by laboring men high in authority in those organizations that I am mistaken in that view, and that the overwhelming opinion among laboring men, according to the statement of these gentlemen, is that they desire to have the limit of 8 hours.

I do not believe I am mistaken in the views I originally expressed, so far as I gave my reasons based upon my own judgment, but I am constrained to believe that I was mistaken in the statement that the laboring men desire to have this amendment, and because I regard this as a measure designed for their particular benefit I have concluded that I shall vote for the bill as it is submitted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Chair please have the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts read before the roll is called?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 1 the following proviso:

Provided, That if a Saturday half holiday is given to laborers and mechanics engaged on such work, an employment thereon of not more than 48 hours per week of workdays of not more than 9 hours each shall be deemed a compliance with the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. CRANE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CRANE] is absent from the Chamber. He has a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. BORAH (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. NIXON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who is not now in the Chamber. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when Mr. OVERMAN's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. He is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. PERCY] is kept from the Chamber by a sudden and serious illness of one of his brothers. He is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when Mr. POINDEXTER's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is absent from the Chamber on important business. I think if he were present he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. ROOT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. If he were present, and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Alabama has not voted.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I withdraw my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. BURNHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. FOSTER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is unavoidably absent from the Senate on public business. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is not present in the Chamber, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], and as I find that he has not voted and is not in the Chamber, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I inquire whether he is recorded as voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed he has not voted.

Mr. CHILTON. Then I withdraw my vote.

While I have the floor I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to inquire whether the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have a general pair, as I have already announced, with the senior Senator from Connecticut, but I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am requested to announce that my colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bradley	Fletcher	McLean	Sanders
Bryan	Gallinger	Oliver	Wetmore
Burton	Lippitt	Richardson
Dillingham	Lodge	Root

So Mr. LODGE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I hope the Senator from Idaho will be willing to accept it. It is a small matter and relates to the construction of certain boats. I will explain it in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, on page 4, line 15, after the date "1892," it is proposed to strike out "or to apply to work done under contracts made prior to the passage of this act" and to insert the words "or apply to contracts which have been or may be entered into under the provisions of appropriation acts approved prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the bill now exempts from the application of the proposed law work done under contracts made prior to the passage of this act. There were three vessels—not large vessels—authorized under a recent act which would have been contracted for some time ago but that the plans had to be changed in order to meet the requirements of the appropriation. Unless this alteration is made—for, of course, this will increase very much the price of all these vessels—those vessels will not be constructed and it will be necessary to again appropriate for them. It was thought at the department that as it was an accident owing to the changes in the plans, there would be no objection to exempting them as they would have been exempted had it not been for the delay, under the bill as it now stands.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts may be reread.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be again stated.

The Secretary again read Mr. LODGE's amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment; that is, to the principle of the amendment, but, unless I am in error as to the amendment, it would make necessary some other changes which the amendment does not anticipate.

Mr. LODGE. It was not intended to do anything except extend it to vessels already appropriated for.

Mr. BORAH. With that understanding——

Mr. LODGE. If it goes further than that, the Senator from Idaho can modify it in any way he desires.

Mr. BORAH. So far as I can do so, I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, after the word "party," it is proposed to insert "except contracts made in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York desire all the printed amendments to be considered together?

Mr. ROOT. I think if the first is passed upon the second will follow necessarily. The third is a separate amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I hold in my hand an amendment offered by the Senator from New York under date of May 7, 1912. Is that the amendment which he has offered?

Mr. ROOT. That is the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I see no objection to the amendment, but, because of the manner in which it is inserted, I am of the opinion that it might have a different effect than that which is anticipated. It reads:

On page 1, line 4, after the word "party," insert the words "except contracts made in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal."

Then, with the amendment inserted, the provision would read as follows:

That every contract hereafter made to which the United States, any Territory, or the District of Columbia is a party, except contracts made in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal, and every such contract made for or on behalf of the United States, or any Territory, or said District, which may require or involve the employment of laborers or mechanics shall contain a provision that no laborer or mechanic doing any part of the work contemplated by the contract—

And so forth. Perhaps that is all right.

Mr. ROOT. I think so. I think it incorporates the exception into the general description of contracts affected. That is what it was intended to do.

Mr. BORAH. The purpose of the Senator, of course, is simply to except the Isthmian Canal and contracts made in pursuance of its construction.

Mr. ROOT. That is all.

Mr. BORAH. Now, would the Senator be willing to submit as an amendment an extra section, simply providing that this bill shall not apply to the Isthmian Canal?

Mr. ROOT. Perfectly. There is a suggestion that Col. Goethals himself has made which has come in since this amendment was printed, and I think the Senator from Idaho has a copy of the letter in which he makes the suggestion; and that is, in line 3, on page 4, at the end of the sentence which authorizes the President to waive the provisions of the act as to specific contracts during time of war or when war is imminent, to add these words:

And until January 1, 1915, as to any contract or contracts entered into in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. ROOT. Then, I will withdraw the other amendment which I offered and offer that instead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York withdraws his first amendment and offers an amendment in place thereof, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 3, after the word "imminent," it is proposed to insert "and until January 1, 1915, as to any contract or contracts entered into in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, that disposes of the first two amendments on the paper I have sent to the desk, but I think the third had better be passed upon. It is on page 4, line 15, after the word "ninety-two," insert the words "as modified by the acts of Congress approved February 27, 1906, and June 30, 1906."

That is merely to prevent a possible misunderstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 15, after the word "ninety-two," it is proposed to insert the words "as modified by the acts of Congress approved February 27, 1906, and June 30, 1906."

Mr. ROOT. The bill as reported saves the act, chapter 352 of the laws of 1892, from the effect of the bill. That act has been amended, and I want to make it sure that the act as amended is saved.

Mr. BORAH. What amendment was made to that act to which the Senator refers?

Mr. ROOT. I think it is the amendment——

Mr. BORAH. Is that the amendment excepting foreign labor from the operation of the act?

Mr. ROOT. Yes. It reads:

SEC. 4. The provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to the limitations of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia," approved August 1, 1892, and of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1906, shall not apply to unskilled alien laborers and to the foremen and superintendents of such laborers employed in the construction of the Isthmian Canal within the Canal Zone.

I wanted to be sure that in saving that original act from this we saved also the amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think there should be additional language inserted in the bill by adding, after the amendment already adopted, the words "except as herein otherwise expressly provided." There have been several modifications of the acts of 1892 and 1906, and with the passage of this bill, if the text of those statutes is now in existence, necessarily the latest law will control. There ought to be a provision inserted as to conflicting provisions or provisions that cover the same ground, whether they conflict or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas offer an amendment?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I call it to the attention of the Senator from Idaho, and move that it be adopted as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas proposes the following amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York the words "except as herein otherwise expressly provided."

Mr. ROOT. Might not that have the effect of nullifying the whole amendment?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No. The text of the acts remains the law except in cases where it is expressly provided otherwise by this proposed act.

Mr. ROOT. This provision is that nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify the act of 1892.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. And as amended by the proposal I made it would be that nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal the act of 1892 as amended.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I suggest the words "except as herein otherwise expressly provided."

Mr. BORAH. The Senator's amendment, I think, would have the effect of militating against the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I beg pardon. I did not hear the last remark of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas correctly, it would have the effect of modifying the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I had no such intention. I intended merely to preserve so much of the two acts mentioned as is not changed by the passage of this law.

Mr. BORAH. The act of 1892 does not affect it. I have no particular objection to that amendment. If it is found to be an error, it can be taken care of in conference, I presume.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If my amendment provokes any discussion or is likely to delay the passage of the bill, in view of the fact that other business will shortly take precedence of it, I will withdraw it.

I offer the amendment I send to the desk, and call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas withdraws his former amendment?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. ROOT. I understand the amendment I offered was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New York was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by adding, after the word "not," line 18, on page 3, the following: "Nor to the construction or repair of levees or revetments necessary for protection against floods and overflows on the navigable waters of the United States."

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Arkansas intend that to apply to cases of emergency?

[Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. BORAH. May the amendment again be stated?

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 19, insert a comma and the words "nor to the construction or repair of levees or revetments necessary for protection against floods and overflows on the navigable waters of the United States."

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was not surprised, and yet it was a matter of regret to me, that the beneficent amendment relating to the half holiday was adversely acted upon by the Senate. I have a little amendment that I want to offer. I realize that this bill is going to pass substantially as it is. The Senator from Idaho always gets his bills through, because he is a good tactician; his amiability carries them along on the tide. I offer this amendment, and even though it may not at the moment strike the Senator as a wise one, I trust he will let it go to conference. The friends of the bill will be the conferees on the part of both Houses, and it can be dropped out if the Senator, upon examining it, does not think it is a wise amendment.

I will say simply a word in connection with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 4, before the word "emergency," insert "extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture or to any," so that it will read:

No penalties shall be imposed for any violation of such provision in such contract due to any extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture or to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, etc.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that the addition of the words I have suggested would provide for those unusual industrial emergencies which may arise in the execution of any contracts within a time limit. There may be an exceptional delay in the delivery of material, the plant of the subcontractor may be destroyed or so injured that he is unable to supply the chief contractor with material essential to the execution of his contract, or a railroad wreck might destroy essential material in transit, or important machinery may break down in the shop. These are "extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture" which should justify the remission of a penalty, since they are obviously beyond the control of the contractor, and in justice should be provided against.

The amendment is designed merely to recognize this condition, which is liable to happen and which, I think, is a proper protection to the contractor, so far as the rigid execution of the law is concerned.

I will repeat what I said: I hope the Senator will let the matter go to conference, and if in the judgment of the conferees it is not a wise provision, it can be dropped.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask that the amendment be again read, so that I may catch it?

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I am not going to ask for a vote upon the pending bill to-day, for the reason that a Senator who is absent desires to make some remarks upon it, and, if the Senator from New Hampshire would permit, I would just as soon that his amendment should go over with the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am quite willing that that shall be done. I hope the Senator from Idaho will look carefully at it, and trust that in his wisdom he will think it a proper amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I will give it proper consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho whether it is his intention at 2 o'clock, now closely approaching, to lay aside this bill, or is it his intention to ask that the unfinished business be laid aside?

Mr. BORAH. A Senator who is absent from the Chamber desires to make some remarks on this bill. Therefore it was not my intention to press it to a vote to-day. And at 2 o'clock I expect that the unfinished business will be proceeded with.

Mr. HEYBURN. I prefer not to start what I have to say unless I can finish my remarks.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer an amendment and call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 14, after "intelligence," insert:

Or for the purchase of supplies by the Government, whether manufactured to conform to particular specifications or not.

And strike out the same words beginning with "or," in line 17, and ending with the words "or not," in line 19.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as this section is constructed it is open, in my judgment, to some doubt as to its true meaning. It is not intended, as I understand the chairman, that the 8-hour provision shall apply to the purchase of supplies by the Government, whether manufactured to conform to particular specifications or not. Where this clause is inserted it might appear to be a part of the exception and it would be included in the class with armor and armor plate. I only offer the amendment in the interest of certainty in the construction of the language.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the fact that the bill is going over, would the Senator from Ohio object to offering the amendment and letting it lie on the table so that we can take it up on the next consideration of the bill?

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Ohio offers it merely for the purpose of making more explicit the terms of the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. That is my only purpose.

Mr. BORAH. With no intention of changing it substantially.

Mr. POMERENE. It does not change it in the least, as I understand the construction of the language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 18642.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I believe I can to-day conclude what I have to say on the metal schedule if not interrupted.

FILES.

The act of 1909 provides a specific duty on files of each class. These specific duties, based on importations for the year 1911, are equivalent to an ad valorem of 61.16 per cent. The proposed rate of duty under the pending House bill is 25 per cent ad valorem. The existing rates average 15 per cent below the rates of the Dingley law and the proposed rate of 25 per cent, according to the Ways and Means Committee's report, makes a further reduction of about 63 per cent.

Though files are made by machinery, the principal expense in their manufacture is the labor cost, as none of the machinery used is automatic. Every machine operation requires the attendance of an operator, so that practically the entire cost except the small expenditure for material is labor cost. In making every one of the files I have here no less than 91 definite, distinct, and separate operations of handling are required for each individual piece from the time the steel enters the factory until the finished files are placed in stock. In addition to these distinct operations, there are numerous minor operations which have not been included in the total which I have given. One company, which manufactures about 50 per cent of the files used in this country, informed the committee that it carried in stock regularly no less than 6,000 varieties of files, every one of which is a fine-edged tool which must be handled as a unit in practically every operation through which it passes.

Exhibit A of the samples I have here is a 2-inch ground file. In producing these files 1 pound of steel, costing 25 cents, will make 83 dozen files, having a net value of $68.06. In other words, the labor expended on this pound of steel enhances its value 272 times its cost.

Exhibit B is a 5½-inch metal file of which there are large importations. One pound of steel, costing 19 cents, will make 8 dozen files, having a net value of $6.72, or 35⅓ times the cost of the raw material.

Exhibit C is a 14-inch flat file. One dozen of these files require 21 pounds of steel, at a cost of 3½ cents a pound, or 73½ cents for one dozen files. These files are sold at about $2.91 per dozen. The labor cost involved in the making of these coarser files is much less than that required for the finer files.

American file makers pay their laborers and help from $1.40 to $1.80 and skilled workmen from $2.40 to $4.25 per day. In Germany laborers and assistants receive from 64 cents to $1.08 per day and skilled workmen from 85 cents to $2.14 per day. Switzerland, France, and Germany are cheap competitors of the United States in the manufacture of files. America, however, is the best market in the world for the sale of files. Within the past five years a number of foreign countries, including France, Germany, Japan, and Sweden, have materially increased their duties on files, which has restricted the field for the sale of American-made files. Are we now going to open up the American market to the cheaper-made files of foreign countries and destroy our own industry?

SHOTGUNS AND RIFLES.

[Paragraphs 30 and 31.]

Manufacturers of shotguns stated at the hearings held by the Senate Committee on Finance that the proposed reduction of the duty on shotguns to 35 per cent would be absolutely fatal to that industry in the United States. A former duty of 30 per cent on breech-loading shotguns utterly failed to protect American manufacturers, and that industry amounted to practically nothing as compared with its present output until the duty was raised to a point where it represented the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. Belgium is the principal competitor of the United States in the manufacture of shotguns. In the better class of these guns practically 80 per cent of the cost is directly due to expenditure for labor.

Parker Bros., manufacturers of high-grade guns, informed the committee that European labor in their line costs about a third of what it does in this country. They stated that a gun costing $20 to manufacture represents $16 in labor and $4 in material. In Belgium the labor cost on the same gun could be reduced from $16 to $5.33, making the factory cost of the gun $9.33, which, after paying a duty of $5.39, would make its importation price $14.72 as compared with the American cost of $20.

Take the gun known as "Sauer, No. 1," which Schoverling, Daly & Gales, of New York, purchase abroad at $24 and on which the duty amounts to $14.40, making the importation price $38.40. Parker Bros. state that this gun could not be made in America for $50 owing to the geater labor cost here. The average wage paid to laboring men in the Belgium gun factory is from 2 to 4 francs per day—from 40 to 80 cents—as compared with from $2 to $3 per day in this country. The average Belgium wage is about 55 cents, a large number of women and children being employed in the assembling of guns and similar classes of work. No women or children are employed in American gun factories, and I do not believe such conditions as exist in Belgium would be tolerated in this country.

Practically all of the gun barrels used by American shotgun manufacturers are imported from Belgium. Several American manufacturers undertook to make these barrels, but finally had to give up the attempt, as they could not begin to compete with the product of Belgium factories, which are imported free under the present tariff. Parker Bros. Gun Co. erected an addition to its factory, put in up-to-date machinery, and brought men from Belgium to show their blacksmiths how to make gun barrels. This company soon had to give up the attempt, however, as they had to pay their blacksmiths from 32 to 40 cents an hour, while the highest wage paid Belgium blacksmiths for exactly the same grade of work is 11 cents an hour. American gun manufacturers are in considerable doubt as to whether the pending bill takes shotgun barrels from the free list of the act of 1909, and places them in the basket clause at a duty of 25 per cent, thus increasing the cost of raw material to the American manufacturer and at the same time decreasing the duty that protects American wage earners against the wage scale of Europe.

FISHING TACKLE.

The Underwood bill reduces the duty on fishing hooks from 45 to 10 per cent, and on fishing tackle from 45 to 30 per cent. The specific duty on these articles varied to such an extent until the law of 1909 was passed that the industry can hardly be said to have been fairly established in this country until that year. Now it is proposed to destroy it by opening the market to competition from Japan and other countries. In making fishing flies, which require skilled and experienced help, a manufacturer stated before the committee that he paid women $1.50 a day, whereas the amount paid in England for the same work is 50 cents a day, and in Japan, where the business is growing, labor costs are very much less.

The fishing material of this kind is a luxury rather than a necessity, and the profits of retailers are so great that the reduced duty would not in the least affect the consumer. The imporations now, under the existing law, are equal to the home production. Fishing hooks are sold for 25 cents a thousand, while the retailer sells them in some cases two for a nickel. It is clear that there would be no advantage to the consumer in the reduction of the duty in this case.

The Japanese are now offering to sell in this country, duty paid, flies at 45 cents per gross, and a manufacturer testified before the committee that it cost him $3 to make a gross. The Chinese and Japanese have developed this business recently, and are seeking to export their goods.

If the duties are reduced as proposed by this House bill, it will simply stop the growth of this industry in the United States, if it does not eventually kill it. There is greater reason now for imposing 45 per cent tariff on these goods than there was in 1909. The wire for fishing hooks costs about the same now as then, but some of the other materials are much higher, while labor laws limit the working of girls and women, who were largely employed in this industry, raising the cost of production of artificial flies.

The following table gives a comparison of wages paid American and English labor engaged in making various kinds of fishing tackle:

Miss C. J. Frost, of Stevens Point, Wis., advised the committee that the proposed reduction of the duty on fishing tackle would either compel her to reduce the wages of her 155 employees or else close her factory. Miss Frost said she had been informed that the best women employees in the Norwegian fishing-tackle industry receive 30 cents for 12 hours' work. She stated that the best help in her factory received $2 a day, and that she employed a good many girls from $4 to $8 per week.

SAWS.

The House bill reduces the duty on saws from an equivalent ad valorem duty of 24.30 per cent in 1911 to 12 per cent. The testimony of saw manufacturers is to the effect that they could not compete with the foreign product unless they could obtain labor at the same rates. That can not be done unless all industries are treated alike. The large saw factories near Strassburg in Germany pay from 3 to 4 marks, or less than $1, for a day of 10 hours' work, which would be 9.6 cents an hour as compared with from 40 to 47 cents an hour for similar labor in the United States.

The proprietor of a large manufacturing establishment in Indiana, who has a factory in Canada, testified that he could not compete with the British manufacturers in Canada, and that led him to establish his works in that country. The proposed rate here is much lower than the British preferential rate in Canada. Even now English saws can be imported into the United States and sold in competition with the American products. With the rate cut more than one-half it is clear that the American producer could continue in business only by reducing wages all along the line to accord with the lower duty.

ALUMINUM.

Aluminum was distinctively an American industry in its origin. The process of extracting this metal from bauxite or clay was invented by an American. Patents on the process have expired, however, and now the field for making aluminum is open to anyone. At first aluminum, owing to the difficulty of its manufacture, was a very expensive material. I have been informed that the aluminum top of the Washington Monument cost $16 a pound, and for a number of years aluminum sold for around $8 a pound. The expense of manufacturing aluminum has been so greatly reduced, however, that now it is, bulk for bulk, cheaper than any other metal except iron. In volume its cost is 15 per cent that of tin, 40 per cent that of copper, and 90 per cent that of zinc. Aluminum is the most prevalent metal in the world, there being something like 8 or 10 times as much aluminum as there is iron.

Foreign manufacturers of aluminum, however, have important advantages over the American manufacturers, due to their cheaper labor, cheaper electrical power, proximity to raw materials, and a better quality of bauxite. In no metal does the cost of labor enter so largely as in the cost of aluminum. The mineral bauxite from which aluminum is made is a cheaper mineral, costing less than $1 per ton in the ground, but its transformation into alumina and thence into aluminum worth $360 per ton is an expensive process involving a great deal of labor.

Limestone, another mineral necessary in the manufacture of aluminum, is worth only a few cents per ton in the ground, but absorbs much labor in its service in the aluminum industry. Carbons, a highly wrought product made from petroleum coke, which is valued at less than $5 per ton, are essential in aluminum manufacture, and add to its high labor cost. Similarly the 5 tons of coal consumed in making a ton of aluminum and the soda ash required are costly, largely because of the labor required to prepare and handle them. From the cheap ore to the highly concentrated ingot, aluminum manufacture is primarily an unusually elaborate labor process. The European manufacturer pays only one-third as much for his labor as does the American manufacturer, or the American manufacturer spends three times as much in labor to produce 1 pound of aluminum—and labor is a large majority of the total cost of production—as does his foreign competitor.

The water powers of Europe generating electricity for aluminum manufacture are found, with one exception, in Norway, the Alps, and the south of France. The high heads there available make it impossible for American water powers to compete in cost of electricity developed. Our water powers require more labor to develop, our machinery is more expensive, our developed cost per horsepower installed is from two to four times the European cost. Here, again, the European manufacturer has an advantage over the American producer.

Of the 14 foreign manufacturers of aluminum, 10 are able to locate their plants within 150 to 200 miles of the bauxite beds, necessitating thus for the bauxite required a trivial transportation charge. The American manufacturers have a 1,500-mile rail haul, or approximately eight times the transportation charge of the foreign manufacturers. The remaining European manufacturers have plants located either on or close to tidewater, affording thus cheap water transportation.

The foreign bauxite employed by the foreign manufacturer contains 65 per cent of alumina, the essential ingredient, as against 55 per cent contained in the American ore. In the ore employed, therefore, the foreign manufacturer has an advantage over the American manufacturer expressed by the ratio of 6 to 5, or he uses four and a fraction tons of bauxite to make 1 ton of aluminum, whereas the American manufacturer uses 5 tons to accomplish the same result.

The are 14 foreign aluminum manufacturers, with a production capacity of 103,400,000 pounds of aluminum. The total consumption outside the United States is 55,000,000 pounds, leaving thus a capacity of 48,400,000 pounds in excess of the foreign demand. In France alone there are 7 aluminum manufacturers, producing 40,040,000 pounds, while France consumes only 6,600,000 pounds, which leaves 33,440,000 pounds surplus, or three-fourths of the total consumption of the United States, which the pooled French producers are prepared to dump upon our market from behind their own tariff wall, with its 7½ cents per pound duty. The United States consumes about 45,000,000 pounds of aluminum. In the year ending June 1, 1910, over 12,000,000 pounds were imported; in the following year, 6,500,000 pounds.

The framers of the pending bill evidently made a serious mistake in estimating that the duty on aluminum provided for was equivalent to about 4 cents a pound on crude and 6 cents a pound on sheet aluminum. In a letter dated February 5, 1912, addressed to the Treasury Department, Mr. Loeb, collector of customs at the port of New York, stated that the then price of aluminum ingot in the French market was 11 to 11¼ cents, whereas the price had been as low as 10.8 cents in the latter part of 1911; and that the price of sheet during the last six months had been from 16 to 20 cents per pound, or, say, an average of 18 cents. A 25 per cent ad valorem duty on aluminum, therefore, does not mean 4 cents and 6 cents, as stated by the framers of the proposed bill, but actually means 2¾ cents on ingot and 4½ cents on sheet, a cut of 4¼ cents and 6½ cents per pound, respectively, on ingot and sheet from the rates prevailing under the Payne law.

The Underwood bill estimates a revenue of $2,500,000 from importations of aluminum ingot at 2¾ cents per pound duty as a result of the passage of this bill. Over 90,000,000 pounds of aluminum would have to be imported to secure this estimated revenue. The United States consumption is only 45,000,000 pounds, so that double the present consumption would have to be imported to realize such a revenue. Assuming, however, that a 4-cent-per-pound duty were levied on aluminum ingot, to realize the revenue estimated in the Underwood bill 62,500,000 pounds would have to be imported, or nearly 20,000,000 pounds more than the present United States consumption.

In 1910, under the Payne-Aldrich bill, over 12,000,000 pounds of aluminum ingot were imported, with a resulting revenue of $875,000. Under the proposed Underwood bill, with its actual tariff on aluminum ingot of 2¾ cents per pound, 31,800,000 pounds would have to be imported to return the same revenue. This would mean an importation of two-thirds of the total domestic consumption.

The aluminum industry in the United States has an investment of $30,000,000 and gives steady employment to between 5,000 and 6,000 persons. If the Underwood bill is passed, with its invitation to the foreign aluminum manufacturers to dump their 48,000,000 pounds surplus on the American market, it will work great injury to the domestic producers, which will find expression in loss of employment to American workmen and destruction of American capital, with a corresponding benefit to the foreign manufacturers.

METAL LACE AND EMBROIDERY.

I wonder if Democratic orators will dare tell the working people of this country how much the Underwood bill has benefited them by reducing the tariff on such luxuries as these gold metal laces I hold here in my hand? [Exhibiting.] The only person that has any interest whatever in the tariff on such finery as this, outside of the very rich, who are the only ones that can afford to deck themselves in such ornaments, is the workingman or woman whose livelihood depends upon the success of this industry in America. To them it is of vital importance whether the tariff is sufficient to maintain the American wage scale against the products of cheaper European labor. The industry covered by this paragraph employs directly about 35,000 people and represents an investment of nearly $15,000,000.

A representative of the Braid Manufacturers' Association of the United States, who appeared before the Senate Committee on Finance, stated that in Europe, where much of this class of goods is manufactured, labor and expenses are about one-third what they are in this country. He furthermore stated that for braid manufactured in the United States the cost of material used is approximately 40 per cent, while 60 per cent represents the cost of labor and other expenses.

This witness, Mr. Henry W. Schloss, president of the Castle Braid Co., of New York, stated that metal threads, laces, and embroidery trimmings, and so forth, are used chiefly for ornamental purposes. He called attention to the following "Daily hint from Paris," as published in the New York Herald, indicating the use that is made of the material my Democratic friends propose to reduce the duty on:

White velvet evening gown, brocaded in white and gold. Violet satin, covered with violet mousseline de soie, gold passenmenterie ornaments.

Even the Senator from Iowa seems to think that the present duty on this class of finery is unbearable, and he likewise proposes a reduction that will benefit no one but those rich enough to pay for these gold and dazzling trappings regardless of their cost. What defense is there in the world for reducing the duty on such luxuries as these? Certainly if the pending measure is a revenue tariff, then this paragraph is an excellent one on which to raise revenues. This paragraph is no place to reduce a duty to a point that will affect the employment of a single American wage earner. How is the Democratic Party going to explain its haste in reporting a bill reducing the duty on gold laces and embroideries and its delay in reporting a bill relating to the tariff on cotton laces, such as the vast majority of American women are content to wear? Why this favoritism for the wearers of gold laces and embroideries?

HOOKS AND EYES.

Hooks and eyes furnish a good illustration of the effect of this proposed reduction of duty. Under the McKinley law the duty was 45 per cent, which was supposed to be approximately 49 cents for a great gross of hooks and eyes. But "dumping" and undervaluation greatly lowered that rate, and importations were larger. Under the act of 1897 a specific duty was imposed, and also part ad valorem, equivalent to a total of 37 cents per great gross. For the year 1898 the importations were 237,867 pounds. Domestic manufacturers rapidly developed the industry, and in 1909 the imports were only 11,436 pounds.

The act of 1909 reduced the tariff to approximately 35 cents per great gross, under which importations increased to the extent of 54,463 pounds in 1911, and have been coming in this year at double that amount. Now it is proposed to abolish the specific duty entirely and fix the duty at only 15 per cent ad valorem. This cuts the present duty about one-half, and naturally the American manufacturers assert that such a reduction will seriously interfere with their production.

The American and Star Pin Cos. stated to the committee that they sent a representative abroad last year to ascertain the labor costs of manufacturing hooks and eyes in foreign countries. The following is a comparison of the wages which they submitted to the committee:

For operators of automatic machinery, England pays $10 per week; Germany, $7.50 per week; and United States, $20 per week.

For women employed in packing the goods, or "bench" work, so called, England pays $3 per week; Germany, $2.70 per week; and United States pays $8 to $9 per week.

The tenders of automatic machines, both in England and in Germany, are women, who are paid not to exceed $3.50 per week, as against boy tenders in this country, who receive from $7.25 to $9 per week. We do not consider it safe to employ women for this work.

We wish to call the committee's particular attention to the item of mounting the hooks and eyes upon cards: In foreign countries this is done for from 4½ to 6 cents per great gross, while we actually pay in this country from 30 to 35 cents per great gross for the same operation.

One feature of the hook and eye industry in foreign countries, especially in England, is the employment of women and children, who work long hours for a mere pittance in the carding of hooks and eyes. An agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor found that in the Birmingham district women stitched 384 hooks and the same number of eyes linked together on a card for the munificent wage of 1 cent. This agent found that some of the women worked from 3 o'clock in the morning until 11 or 12 o'clock at night in the effort to earn enough to buy bread for themselves and their little ones.

The following is a quotation from the speech of Mr. Will Crooks, in the English Parliament, discussing the disgraceful condition of the hook and eye industry in England:

Carding hooks and eyes is another occupation which can not be described as lucrative. Our specimen woman begins her toil at 5 p. m., when the work arrives, and does not cease until 11 a. m. next day, when it has to go back. We are notified that for her the 24 hours includes "a few hours' bed." When work is plentiful she and her daughter earn between them 3s. 4d. a week. But the children are made to work, and it is stated that by "sticking as close as glue" to their breadwinning the entire family can earn 6s. a week. Fortunately, they have to pay only 3s. 6d. for their 3 rooms—a rent that would be higher but for the fact that there is "no water in the house."

It is such labor conditions that are confronting American men and women if they are forced into open competition with the products of foreign countries without the protection of an adequate tariff.

GAS MANTLES.

There are about 50 manufacturers of gas mantles in the United States, whose combined output is approximately 60,000,000 mantles a year. The manufacturers' sales value of this product is estimated at about $3,700,000, an average of a little above 6 cents apiece. Of this sum there is expended about $1,000,000 annually for labor directly engaged in the manufacture and sale of the mantles. These mantles are sold to the consumer at fixed prices—10, 15, and 25 cents each. Such prices represent a profit in most cases of fully 100 per cent to the retailer and the jobber. It is apparent, therefore, that the proposed reduction in the duty on mantles will not in any way benefit the consumer, the only effect being to increase the middle man's profit.

As in nearly every other case of a tariff reduction, the persons who will feel its effect is the wage earner in the industry that will be forced to compete with the products of cheap foreign labor. The proposed reduction of the gas-mantle rate from 40 to 25 per cent would enable the foreign-made mantles to be imported at a saving in duty of from $4 to $6 per thousand. On an average of $5 per thousand the saving to the American importer would amount on the annual consumption of 60,000,000 to $300,000, or half a cent per mantle. No one will contend that this half a cent reduction will be of any advantage whatever to the American consumer of gas mantles. It simply means the taking of $300,000 out of the pockets of American wage earners, who would lose that much work, and placing it in the pockets of importers, representing foreign manufacturers. For my part I prefer that this $300,000 should go to American workingmen instead of to these importers, who would destroy an American industry for their own profit.

The manufacturers of gas mantles contend that the duties on mantle scrap, thorium salts, and monazite sand should be readjusted, so as to better represent their use in the manufacture of gas mantles. The present law and the pending bill placed the same rate of duty on the raw material as on the finished product.

PENS.

There are six factories manufacturing steel pens in the United States. The total output of pens made by these factories is 2,800,000 gross annually. These factories employ 940 persons, and their wages amount to $400,000 a year. The capital invested in the American steel-pen industry is about $1,000,000. Despite the large production of American pens, great quantities of pens used in this country, such as the Gillott and the Spencerian, are manufactured in Birmingham, England. American manufacturers have experienced much difficulty in building up the pen industry against the popularity of some of the English products.

The United States Government itself is a very large user of metallic pens, its contracts requiring about 60,000 gross a year. Manufacturers are especially anxious to get the Government contract, owing to the advertising it gives their brand of pens, and for that reason they quote a lower price to the Government than to the general trade. The Eagle Pencil Co. is supplying the Government with pens at 12½ cents a gross. Ten thousand gross of Falcon pens at this price are purchased by the Post Office Department alone for what is called "lobby" use—that is, for the use by the public in the post offices throughout the country. Other departments of the Government purchase a better grade pen at 19 cents a gross. The price at which pens are sold the Government is not a fair indication, however, as to the cost of their production in this country, for, as I said before, manufacturers are anxious to get Government business on account of the advertising it gives their products or to dispose of surplus stock.

Manufacturers of pens informed the Finance Committee that it cost them from 20 to 42 cents a gross to manufacture pens in this country. The average price appears to be around 22 cents per gross. When you stop to think that pens are retailed at about 1 cent apiece, you can realize how great are the profits of the middleman. The committee was informed that the retailer's profits on pens averaged around 100 per cent. This being true, it is difficult to see how the proposed reduction of the tariff on pens would affect the consumer in any way. Undoubtedly the retailer would add that small margin to his already large profits.

The tariff on pens is of vital importance, however, to the wage earners employed by that industry in the United States. About 66 per cent of the cost of producing pens is in the labor employed. Owing to the energetic competition of foreign pen makers, American manufacturers have to sell their product on a close margin even under the present tariff. Undoubtedly any further reduction of the tariff would have to be met by a corresponding reduction in wages, as that is the only item in which American manufacturers can effect any further economy.

There are about 20 processes necessary in the manufacture of steel pens, in 8 of which each particular pen is handled individually. Mr. Alexander C. Wood, of the Esterbrook Steel Pen Manufacturing Co., of Camden, N. J., illustrated this process to the committee as follows: He said the work goes through their factories in units or lots of about 125 gross. That would be 18,000 pieces of steel, or blanks, in each lot of pens. In each lot that goes around there would be 144,000 pieces of steel that would have to be handled, each particular pen, each time it goes through those eight processes. Mr. Wood stated that his company paid for those eight processes $9.30, and that in England the same work is done for $3.92.

Mr. George E. Bartol, president of the Hunt Pen Co., of Camden, N. J., submitted the following table to the committee, showing the wages paid in the pen industry in this country and in England, the table being based upon six operations:

[Basis of scale is a quantity technically known as a "lot," averaging 120 gross of pens.]

Six primary and principal operations.	English scale.	Equivalent United States currency.	United States scale.	Excess paid over English scale.

The Eagle Pencil Co., which has a large plant in New York City, built a factory in London a short time ago. Mr. F. W. Lilley, representing the Eagle Co., told the Finance Committee that the average wage per person for the 1,300 employees of the New York factory is $9.72, as shown by the actual pay roll of the factory. In the London factory of this same company the average wage per person for the 250 employees for that factory is $2.15. Mr. Lilley further stated that the London factory of his company is being operated at only one-third of its capacity, owing to the fact that they can buy other British pens too cheap to undertake to manufacture them in the London plant. Mr. Lilley said that the Eagle Co. bought pens of a Birmingham firm for 1⅞ pence (3⅞ cents) per gross. Other pens are bought at 4½, 5, and 6 cents per gross, respectively. The 3-pence pen, even at a 12-cent specific duty, can be laid down in New York for 18 cents, which is 2 cents a gross under the cost of making similar pens in the New York factory of the Eagle Pencil Co.

It is apparent from these comparisons of wages in the United States and England that the proposed reduction in the duty on metallic pens from 12 cents a gross, an equivalent in 1911 to nearly 50 per cent ad valorem, to 25 per cent would either have to be met by a corresponding reduction in the wages of American workmen or else the American pen manufacturers would have to go out of business.

According to estimates submitted to the Finance Committee, the profits in this industry have been very moderate, ranging from almost nothing to not more than 10 per cent. A duty of 25 per cent ad valorem on pens figures out 6 cents a gross, which amounts to forty-two one-thousandths of a cent per pen. On a 10-cent package of pens this would equal half a cent. It is absolutely certain that the consumer would never get the benefit of that half a cent, and that he would have to continue paying 10 cents a package for pens as he now does. The proposed reduction in duty would go into the pockets of the importer, the jobber, and retailer, just as it will in nearly every other instance in this schedule where the tariff is lowered.

The proposed reduction of half a cent a pound on steel used in the manufacture of pens is so infinitesimal that it would be of no value whatever either to the manufacturer or the consumer of American pens. This reduction would be about one-eighth of a cent to a gross of pens, or one ninety-sixth of a cent on 1 dozen pens, such as the ordinary consumer usually buys. It is equally certain that the consumer would not get the benefit of this reduction of one ninety-sixth of a cent on the steel used in the pen any more than he would the reduction of half a cent on the pens themselves.

WATCHES AND CLOCKS.

The chief competition to the American watch industry comes from Switzerland, which country is noted for its cheap watches. In no other paragraph of the metal schedule does the cost of labor play any more important part than in this paragraph relating to watches. The American watch must compete with that of the Swiss factory, where the cost of labor is a third what it is in this country. The labor cost of a 7-jeweled American watch is 87.33 per cent, of a 15-jeweled watch 86.21 per cent, of a 17-jeweled watch 84.14 per cent, and grades above 17 jewels average 81 per cent of its total cost. The Elgin National Watch Co., of Elgin, Ill., one of the largest watch factories in America, reports the following wages paid its employees: Skilled labor (men), $4.19 average wages per day; males (entire force), $3.06 average wages per day; females (entire force), $1.65 average wages per day; total (entire force), $2.40 average wages per day.

The following table shows the average wages paid in watch factories in England, Switzerland, and Italy, as compared with wages paid by the Waltham Watch Co. in this country:

The United States imports from 600,000 to 1,000,000 Swiss watch movements every year, even under the present tariff. The pending bill proposes to reduce by more than one-half the duty on watches not having more than seven jewels and makes a cut of about 10 per cent in the equivalent ad valorem on watches having more than seven jewels. Manufacturers of cheaper American watches believe that such a reduction will drive them out of business or else force them to adopt the wage scale of Switzerland. I have just pointed out what such a wage scale would mean to the American workingman.

In Switzerland watch and clock making is the national industry. Swiss municipalities maintain schools of watchmaking just as public schools are maintained in this country. The Swiss is the most skilled watchmaker in the world. American ingenuity in the way of watchmaking machinery is being made use of by Swiss factories, so that the United States no longer has any advantage over the little Republic in that regard. The Swiss watchmaker also has an advantage over his American rival in that he pays little or no duty on his raw material.

Most of the jewels used in the manufacture of American watches are imported, and these jewels, consisting of garnets, rubies, and sapphires, amount, in many cases, to 50 per cent of the material cost. By the act of 1909 the American watchmaker has to pay a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on the jewels for his watches. Many American watchmakers also import their mainsprings, hands, cases, and hairsprings, and have to pay a duty of 40 per cent on these articles. Other manufacturers, especially of the lower grades of watches, import their dials and pay a duty of 3 cents on each dial, with 40 per cent ad valorem added.

The tariff act of 1909 increased the duty on the three lower grades of watch movements, leaving the duties on the two higher grades the same as under the Dingley law.

Comparing the importation of watch movements under the Dingley law, for the years 1898 and 1907, watches of 7 jewels and under showed an increase of 482 per cent; watches of 7 to 11 jewels decreased 19 per cent; those of 11 to 15 jewels increased 878 per cent; those of 15 to 17 jewels, 916 per cent; and those having more than 17 jewels, 366 per cent. Under the act of 1909 the importations of the three lower grades appear to have decreased. As a matter of fact, however, this decrease is not real. Importers are now evading the duty on watch movements by importing "knock-down" watches as material at the 40 per cent ad valorem rate. This is clearly shown by the increase of nearly $200,000 in the importation of watch material in 1911 as compared with 1910.

Recent investigations developed the fact that at least seven New York importers of watch movements are now engaged in importing the material for watch movements and having it assembled in New York. One importer is said to employ at least 75 men in assembling these movements, which have been brought in at a lower duty by having the works, hands, faces, cases, and other parts shipped separately.

The success of the Swiss watch manufacturers in selling their product in this country is attributed also to the fact that the retailers can make a larger profit on Swiss watches. The name of a local dealer is placed on the Swiss watch, which makes it more of interest to the dealer to sell them, whereas the American watches are marked with the manufacturers' name as a guaranty for their quality. American watches are largely sold on their reputation, which is not true of the Swiss product.

The protection that has been afforded American watch manufacturers by the tariff has not resulted in increasing the cost of watches to the American consumer. Prices of American watches have decreased considerably since 1898, while at the same time many improvements have been made in their quality. Nor has the tariff resulted in American watch companies accumulating unreasonable profits. The Waltham Watch Co., for instance, informed the Finance Committee that it had been able to earn a dividend of only 3.3 per cent on its tangible assets.

The United States watch production in 1910 amounted to $11,771,000. The exportation of watches from this country in that year amounted to $1,228,713. It is estimated that the importations under the pending bill would amount to $1,500,000.

American clock manufacturers also are greatly worried over the proposed reduction of the duty on clocks. Even under the present tariff German clock manufacturers are making serious inroads on the American industry in its home market. The Germans are fast taking the bulk of the foreign trade that American clock makers formerly enjoyed. There are now 10,000 employees of the clock industry in this country. They receive from double to three times the wages paid German clock makers.

German clock factories now possess duplicates of all the machinery used by American clock factories. Several years ago German clock makers secretly sent men to this country to obtain employment in New England clock factories and study their methods and machinery. These Germans made drawings of American machinery and movements, which they carried back to the Black Forest country, and now the German factories are as well equipped as any in the United States. With their lower labor cost the Germans can undersell the Americans in almost any market.

The German factories make a business of imitating successful models of American clocks. These imitations are made with cheaper labor and of cheaper material. Accordingly they can be placed upon the market at a price considerably under that which the American clock maker can afford to accept for his superior product. The consumer, however, can not tell the difference between the original clock and its imitation, so far as appearances are concerned.

A representative of the Seth Thomas Clock Co. told the committee that a few years ago his company put out what they called a "joker" clock, a pretty little timepiece, which proved very popular. German clock makers, however, copied it with inferior material and flooded the American market with these cheap imitations. The result was that the sale of both the Seth Thomas and the German clocks soon fell flat, people being unable to distinguish the difference between the good and the poor timepiece.

A New Haven company had a somewhat similar experience in Canada with its "Tattoo Intermittent" alarm clock. The Germans copied this clock, even to its name, which was printed in red letters on the dial. On complaint, the Canadian Government stopped the importation of the German clock with the same name. Then the Germans changed the name to that of "Identical New Haven." This cheaper German clock is now competing with the original New Haven product on the Canadian market. It is, of course, a very inferior timepiece to the American clock, but it is difficult for the average person to tell which is the genuine and which is the imitation clock.

By lowering the duty on clocks the American market will be the dumping ground for similar products of these German factories that are resorting to every trick of the trade to destroy an American industry.

In the last 20 years the price of an ordinary mantle clock has been reduced 50 per cent and the price of an ordinary alarm clock has been reduced 60 per cent. It is apparent, therefore, that the tariff has not fixed the price of American clocks beyond the point necessary to assure the workmen in those industries a living wage.

LEAD.

Lead miners and smelters of this country are fully aware of what the proposed reduction of the duty on lead means to them. They had a bitter taste of a Democratic tariff revision under the Wilson bill when the price of lead went down to 2.4 cents per pound in 1896. It is a fact well known to mining men that lead can not be mined in the United States for any length of time when the price goes below 3.5 cents. When that dead line is reached either the lead mines must shut down or they will have to reduce the wages of their miners to the basis of Mexico and Spain. Already American lead miners are being seriously affected by the agitation for a reduction of the duty on lead. Within the last few months the price of lead has dropped from 4.4 to 4 cents a pound. This is lower than it has been any time since the fall of 1907. At that time, with the price of lead down to 4 cents, a number of mines in Idaho had to close, while others continued in operation only by confining themselves to the output of the better grades of ore.

Mr. J. F. Callbreath, jr., of Denver, secretary of the American Mining Congress, informed the Finance Committee that the average lead mine of the United States could not operate at less than 5 cents unless it made a profit from associated metals. He stated that the mine in which he personally was interested had to cease operation when lead went below 5 cents. If it were not for the fact that Coeur d'Alene ores carried silver they could not be mined without a loss, even at 4.4 cents per pound, which has been the average price for the last three years. It takes part of the silver value and all of the lead value to produce and market the lead.

It is apparent, therefore, that even under present duty the price of lead is nearing the point at which American mines can not operate successfully in competition with lead from Mexico and Spain. With such a situation confronting us it seems to me all important that we should first make a most careful study of the conditions under which lead is produced in Mexico and Spain before we take any step that would force American miners to the level of the miners of those countries.

Any change in the tariff that would jeopardize lead mining in this country would affect 25,000 wage earners in the States of Utah, Colorado, and Idaho, and fully 7,000 miners in Missouri, not to mention men employed in other lead-producing States. It is estimated that, counting the families of the wage earners, fully 75,000 persons in the Rocky Mountain States are dependent for their living on the mining of lead ores, and fully 20,000 persons in the Missouri country to which I have referred.

The average wage paid lead miners in the Coeur d'Alene district is $3.60 per day of eight hours. Mr. John A. Rock, past president of the Miners' Union at Kellogg, Idaho, who appeared before the Finance Committee as the chosen representative of the Idaho lead miners, gave the committee the following schedule of wages paid men in the lead mining districts: Muckers, $3 and $3.50; machinemen, $3.50 and $4; timbermen, $3.50 and $4; all underground helpers, such as skip tenders, car trammers, nippers, and timber rustlers, $3.50 to $4; hoist men, motor men, and pump men, $4; millmen, blacksmiths, and machinists, $3.50 to 7. Mr. Rock stated that everywhere in the district the men underground are paid at least $3 a day, and that men underground work only eight hours a day. He stated that the lead miners are among the best class of citizens, 60 per cent of them being American born, and that present conditions in the lead-mining districts are as good as anywhere else in the United States. These miners have been able to establish comfortable homes for themselves and their families, and the stores in a number of towns are in the hands of men who have made their money by saving their wages while working for the mining companies.

If the mines are shut down, these men will be out of employment, as there is no other work that they can do in those mining regions. Idleness and starvation would soon succeed the industry and prosperity that now make happy and contented thousands of people in the intermountain mining regions.

Let us take a look at the miners in Mexico and Spain, to see whether we want to force any American miner to such a standard of living. In Mexico miners are compelled to work 12 hours a day for wages ranging from 26 cents to 78 cents a day. I do not believe any Member of this Senate wants to have American miners working for any such pittance. As soon as railroads are extended into Sonora and Chihuahua, Mexico will be able to open some of the greatest lead mines in all the world. It is but a matter of a short time when these mines will be in active operation.

Mr. A. W. North, of Salt Lake City, recently made a very careful study of the lead mines in Spain. He told the Finance Committee that the wages of pickmen in Almeria are from 39 cents to 52 cents a day, assistants from 30 to 38 cents, boys 21 to 28 cents, and that the maximum wage in the Linares and La Carolina districts was 73 cents a day. The average wage is between 45 and 50 cents a day, consisting of 9 hours in the winter and 11 hours in the summer. According to Mr. North, these Spanish miners live in poor, forlorn sort of homes, generally adobe houses built by the Moors centuries ago. A family lives in a single room. Their cooking arrangements are very meager, a couple of stones with a fire between or some old cooking apparatus of antique fashion. These shacks lack all the sanitary necessities of modern life and would hardly be used for mule sheds in an American mining camp. The Spanish hills and mountains, however, are rich with lead ore, and that country is only waiting the destruction of the protective tariff system of the United States to unload on this country the product of its 50-cents-a-day lead miners. It is not difficult to figure out how long American mine owners could afford to pay their miners $3.60 a day when forced to compete with the 50-cents-a-day labor of Spain.

Competition from Mexico and Spain is not the only cause for worry to the American lead miners. The Canadian bounty system practically guarantees its miners a London price of £18. For instance, the London price of lead at present is £15 10s., so that Canada pays her producers a bounty of £2 10s. for every ton of lead produced. It is apparent, therefore, that the British Columbia miners are protected against Mexican and Spanish lead. They might easily find a profitable market in the United States if a lower tariff were put into effect.

The table following gives a comparison of domestic and foreign lead prices. I call attention particularly to the drop in the New York price and the rise in the London price for the years covered by the Gorman-Wilson Act, when the duty on lead ore was ¾ cent a pound against 1½ cents at present. During the last three years the average New York price of lead was 4.38 cents, while the average London price was equal to 2.88 cents, a difference of 1.5 cents or exactly the amount of the present duty on leading ores.

Mr. Robert N. Bell, State mining inspector of Idaho, told the Finance Committee that past experience had taught Idaho miners that there was not much profit in lead below 4 cents, and that 3.5 cents would put them out of business completely under present conditions. Mr. Edward A. Rozier, representing lead producers of Missouri, declared that the cost of mining lead in that State was $3.60 per 100, without any charge for taxes or dividends, or anything of that kind.

The United States is the largest producer and the largest consumer of lead in the world. In 1910 this country produced 30.7 per cent of the world's lead supply and consumed 33 per cent. The production of refined lead in the United States for 1911 amounted to 486,976 tons, or 3.5 per cent increase over 1910. The consumption of lead in the United States for 1911 was 367,981 tons, or 26,607 tons less than the consumption for the preceeding year. It is apparent that lead mines in the United States are capable of producing all the lead used by this country and that we do not need to depend upon Mexico, Spain, or any other country for our supply of lead.

The following table gives a summary of lead statistics for the United States from 1907 to 1911, inclusive, based on reports of the Geological Survey:

Any curtailment in the mining of lead in the United States would also reduce the output of precious metals. Gold and silver and a considerable portion of these metals are found with lead ore. As I have already pointed out, it requires both the lead and silver content of many lead ores to make such mining profitable. A reduction of tariff that would make lead mining unprofitable would put out of business many of the argentiferous lead mines of the Rocky Mountain country. A reduction in the world's supply of gold and silver would be accompanied by a corresponding rise in prices. I do not believe anyone wants to see the cost of living any higher than what it is at present.

Another most important function of lead ore is its use as a collector for precious metals. Nothing has been developed in the smelting business that equals lead in the collecting of gold from siliceous ore. Siliceous gold and silver bearing ores prevail in all the western mining States. Without the advantage of lead in Utah and Colorado those ores could not be treated and the gold production of the United States would be materially affected.

The pending bill places the same duty on lead products as on the ore and pig lead itself. In other words, it offers no encouragement whatever for the manufacturer of lead in this country. It would therefore be more profitable to the foreigner to smelt his lead abroad and export it to the United States in pigs and bars or any other manufactured form, thus giving additional employment to cheaper foreign labor and throwing out of work thousands of Americans now engaged in the lead industries. This is another instance of the utterly indefensible plan of the pending bill to destroy whatever protection American industries may have had, while at the same time failing to make a reduction in the cost of raw material that might partially compensate for the loss of a protective tariff on their finished products.

In the fiscal year 1911 there were imported in bond and afterwards exported approximately 100,000 tons of lead. If the duty on lead is reduced undoubtedly this 100,000 tons, or about a fourth of the ordinary total production of the United States, will at once be dumped on the American market, as it would be more profitable to market that lead here than to ship it out of the country again.

A serious question has been raised also as to just what the pending bill means when it says that the duty on lead shall be "25 per cent on the lead contained therein." If it should be decided that the value of the lead should be the market price of the lead in the ore, deducting the freight from the port of entry to the American smelter and the cost of smelting, then the pending bill would result in the free admission of all ore containing 15 per cent or less of lead. The importation of such low-grade ore seriously competes with the lead ores of this country that are used in the smelting of siliceous gold and silver ores.

Mr. Callbreath, of the American Mining Congress, pointed out at the hearing of the Finance Committee that any injury of the lead-mining industry in the United States would not be confined to that industry alone. Large sums are spent by lead miners for coal, timber, machinery, tools, explosives, agricultural products, and freight, all of which would suffer from a tariff reduction along with the miners. Mr. Callbreath stated statistics to show that more than 60 per cent of the total expenditure in the production of argentiferous lead ores in the United States is paid for labor. Thousands of employees and their families depend upon the lead industry of the United States and would be the first to suffer from the proposed reduction of the tariff.

SPELTER AND ZINC ORE.

In this connection, Mr. President, I desire to discuss spelter and zinc ore as found in paragraphs 61 and 72. As is well known, the zinc and lead industries are closely related. Zinc and lead ores are largely found in the same districts. Therefore, what I have said in regard to the danger of foreign competition to lead miners is equally true as regards zinc miners of this country.

The principal competitor of the United States in the production of zinc ore is Mexico. The output of zinc ore in Mexico is increasing so rapidly that the imports from that country advanced from 2,000 tons to 115,000 tons in 8 years, as compared with the production of 300,000 tons which it has taken the Joplin district 50 years to reach. Before Congress should undertake to put zinc ore on the free list, as proposed by the pending bill, it is highly important that the country should know the wages that are paid Mexican zinc miners as compared with American wages. I submit the following table, giving the cost of labor in Mexico as compiled from the United States consular reports on the zinc-producing regions of Mexico and from a recent report of Frederick S. Cook, a mining engineer:

Labor in zinc mines.	Gold value of Mexican wages.	Usual wages, Missouri-Kansas district.
Ground boss	$1.42-$2.50	$4.00-$5.00
Shift boss	.85- 1.10	3.00- 4.00
Pump man	.25- 1.50	3.00
Drill man		2.75
Drill helpers		2.50
Shovelers	.50	2.50- 5.00
Hoist men	1.50	2.50- 3.00

Crusher feeder	.75- 1.50	2.50
Laborers	.15- .50	2.00
Blacksmiths	1.50	2.50- 3.50

Based on these wages, the following tables show the cost of ore production in the Joplin district and in Mexican mines, including the transportation of both ores to Kansas and Oklahoma smelters:

The metal content of Joplin ore is approximately 60 per cent, while that of Mexican ore is in the neighborhood of 40 per cent. Therefore, taking 1½ tons of Mexican ore at $13.97 per ton, its cost at the smelter would be $20.96, which would be the proper amount to compare with the total cost of Joplin ore at the smelter, which is $39.61. It is evident, therefore, that a tariff of 1½ cents a pound on the metal content is necessary to equalize this difference in the cost of the two ores.

That the present duty is not prohibitive is shown by the fact that during the last two years there have been brought into the United States 87,406 tons for 1910 and 78,341 tons for 1911. The importation undoubtedly would have been much larger had Mexico not been in a state of revolution during these years. In 1909 the importation was 116,269 tons. As a revenue producer the duty on zinc ore has been a great success, bringing the Government since August 5, 1909, a total of $580,942.62.

Idaho is also becoming a large producer of zinc. Mr. H. F. Samuels, of Wallace, Idaho, stated to the Finance Committee that he believed the Coeur d'Alene district, if protected by a tariff duty, would be producing about 250,000,000 pounds of zinc in a few years. Without the duty on zinc he declared that every zinc mine in Idaho and a great majority of the lead mines, which also hold zinc ore, would be closed down. He pointed out that the expenditures for labor in the Idaho zinc mines amount to 65 per cent of the total cost. The lowest wage paid by the Success Mining Co. in Idaho is $3.50 a day. It is very apparent, therefore, that this country could not continue to operate its mines very long in competition with mines in Mexico which employ miners at an average wage of about 75 cents a day.

The average cost of Joplin ore (concentrates) and ores from other States expressed in the same units of zinc contents is $39.61 per ton in Joplin bins. The average ton of Joplin ore contains 57 per cent zinc metal. Under the general prevailing conditions at American smelters the average cost of smelting 1 ton of ore is $10.50, exclusive of interest on investment, and the average recovery in smelting is 87½ per cent of the metal contained in Joplin ores treated.

The average cost of Mexican ores f. o. b. railroad, Mexico, is $7.09 per ton, and the average zinc contents of these ores is 35 per cent zinc metal. The recovery in smelting of these ores is 85 per cent of the zinc contents of Mexican ores.

Fifty-seven per cent Joplin ore, produced at a cost of $39.61 and smelted at a cost of $10.50 per ton, produces spelter at a cost of $5.04 per 100 pounds, f. o. b. smelter. Thirty-five per cent Mexican ore produced at a cost of $7.09, f. o. b. railroad, Mexico, and smelted at a cost of $10.50 per ton produces spelter at a cost of $4.05 per 100 pounds f. o. b. smelters.

A comparison of these two costs shows an advantage in the production and smelting of Mexican ores of 99 cents per 100 pounds, assuming in both instances that there is no profit to either the Joplin or Mexican miner or to the American smelters.

If the American miner is entitled to a profit on his ore, it is necessary for the price to be higher than his cost of $39.61, and it will require a price of at least $42.61 per ton for 57 per cent zinc ore to give a reasonable profit to the American miner and allow a continuance of fair wages to the workingman. If the American smelter is entitled to a profit, he must receive more than $10.50 for smelting charges per ton of ore.

The following table shows in detail the cost of spelter made from 35 per cent Mexican ore and 57 per cent Joplin ore:

	Mexican, 35 per cent.[1]	Joplin, 57 per cent.[2]

[2] Spelter recovered, Joplin, 87½ per cent, 998 pounds.

A combination of foreign zinc smelters has been formed recently to control the output of spelter and to maintain the price at a point so low that the building of additional smelters abroad will be discouraged by limiting the profit to a reasonable amount. If the excess spelter production by this foreign trust can be dumped into this country, it must necessarily injure our own smelting industry. American smelters are entitled, under the protective theory, to be saved from this possibility. The price at which these Australian ores can be produced allows the foreign smelters to produce spelter at a comparatively low cost, with a good profit to the smelter, and the danger that this country may become the dumping ground of the excess foreign spelter is not a mere idle dream.

The Mexican ore can be smelted in foreign smelters and laid down in New York for 51½ cents per 100 pounds less than these same ores can be smelted in American smelters and laid down in New York. This result is on account of the lesser freight rates from Mexico to Europe and return to New York by water instead of all rail from Mexico to New York and to better recoveries made by foreign smelters owing to their more expensively built factories and greater experience in zinc smelting.

The following table shows the difference in the cost of zinc smelted in the United States and Europe and the price at which spelter can be delivered in New York:

	American.[1]	European.

New zinc mines in the States, other than Missouri and Wisconsin, are being opened, and it is now evident that with the present protection and with the new methods of treatment of refractory ores now in vogue enough zinc ore is being produced in the United States to supply all the spelter required in this country. Large bodies of zinc sulphide ore in Mexico and elsewhere have heretofore been impossible of treatment. New processes now well along toward a practical working basis have been discovered, which will bring this heretofore refractory zinc ore into the market, and it must be considered a serious factor in this discussion.

The increasing demand for spelter in this country necessitates the development of all of our zinc mines. A knowledge of these requirements has resulted in the installation of better machinery and the use of the best engineering practice to produce zinc ores from the lower-grade propositions at the cost of $39.61 per ton, and, naturally, in some instances at even a lesser, but not much lesser, cost. Forty-six per cent zinc ore is now being produced in Australia at a cost of from $4 to $7 per ton f. o. b. Broken Hill, Australia, at the rate of about 350,000 tons per year. The freight rate from Broken Hill to Atlantic and Pacific seaports is approximately $6.50 per long ton. These zinc concentrates are produced from huge dumps which are now already mined or on the surface, and also from immense known deposits of undetermined extent of zinciferous ores yet to be mined. These ores are bought under contract by foreign smelters at a price which, even without duty, prohibits their use in this country, owing to the fact that we have no zinc smelters located near the Atlantic or Pacific tidewater, and the freight rates to the interior prevent the purchase of these ores by the American smelters.

The cost of producing spelter from Australian ores with no profit either to Australian miner, European or American smelters, is as follows:

Table showing cost of spelter from Australian ores.

Cost of ore at mines (46 per cent zinc)	$7.00
Freight to United States or Europe, short ton	6.00

Cost of producing spelter laid down in New York from ore produced in American mines	5.325

Spelter recovered, 85 per cent, 782 pounds.

The difference in the cost of spelter laid down in New York made by American smelters from American ores, and by European smelters from Mexican and Australian ores, allowing the same profit to the miners of ore in each country and the same profit to the smelters, is shown by the following table:

	American.	European using Mexican ore.	European using Austrian ore.

Duty to protect American smelters	.....	1.155	2.325

The difference in cost between spelter made from Mexican ore and spelter made from Joplin ore, at no profit either to miner or smelter, is at least 99 cents per 100 pounds, as I have pointed out. The difference in cost between spelter made from Australian ore and spelter made from Joplin ore, at no profit either to miner or smelter, is at least $1.975 per 100 pounds spelter laid down New York. The duty required to equalize these costs would be, maximum, 2 cents per pound of metal contents in ores; minimum, 1 cent per pound.

The difference in cost between foreign spelter and domestic spelter, New York, to allow a reasonable profit to both American miner and American smelter, is at least $1.155 per 100 pounds minimum and $2.325 per 100 pounds maximum. The present duty of 1⅛ cents per pound is not too high. A duty should be maintained which will at least equalize the cost of Mexican and other foreign ores with the cost of Joplin ores, and will at least equalize the cost of foreign spelter produced from Australian and Mexican ore with the cost of domestic spelter produced from domestic ores, each laid down at the point of consumption, namely, at the smelters and at the Atlantic seaboard, respectively. The present duties on the zinc content of ores and on spelter are none too high and will protect the domestic zinc industry. Any less duties, as proposed in the Underwood bill, will fail even to equalize costs, and therefore fail to protect the domestic zinc industry.

The United States Geological Survey has prepared the following summary of spelter statistics for the United States for the years 1907 to 1911, inclusive.

Summary of spelter statistics for 1907–1911.

Production of spelter by United States	249,860	210,424	255,760	269,184	283,526
Consumption of spelter by United States (stocks considered)	226,969	214,167	270,730	245,884	280,059
Production of zinc by world	813,842	796,832	854,066	883,419	974,385
Consumption of zinc by world (stocks considered in United States)	795,315	812,114	879,200	882,573	.....
Excess of world production over consumption	18,527	.....	.....	846	.....
Excess of world consumption over production	.....	15,060	18,740	.....	.....
United States percentage of world production	30.7	26.4	29.9	30.5	29.4
United States percentage of world consumption (stocks considered in United States)	28.5	26.4	30.8	27.9	.....
Rank of United States among spelter-producing countries	First.	Second.	First.	First.	First.
Rank of United States among spelter-consuming countries	First.	First.	First.	First.	.....

This summary shows that the United States leads the world in the production and consumption of spelter, just as it does in lead. This production and consumption of spelter by the United States is about equal, the production for 1910 being 30.5 per cent of the world's supply and the consumption 27.9 per cent.

BASKET CLAUSE.

Mr. President, the basket clause of the pending bill reduces the duty on all articles or ware made in whole or in part of metal and not specially provided for from 45 to 25 per cent ad valorem. This proposed reduction in the tariff affects hundreds of manufacturing industries throughout the United States and is of vital interest to thousands of wage earners. It is of special importance to many new industries whose only source of protection while getting their growth is under the duty provided for in this paragraph. Among the industries that had representatives before the Finance Committee to protest against the proposed reduction of the basket-paragraph duty were hardware manufacturers, metal-pattern makers, and manufacturers of electrical and textile machinery, coated zinc and tin, electric-light bulbs, and incandescent lamps. Machinery manufacturers of the United States, however, are the most largely interested in the proposed reduction of the basket-paragraph duty.

Representatives of the Westinghouse and General Electric Companies, both of which have factories in the United States and Europe, gave some exceedingly interesting and valuable testimony before the Finance Committee in regard to the costs of labor in this country and abroad.

Mr. Edwin M. Herr, president of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., which is interested in a number of foreign companies in England, France, Italy, Austria, and Russia, testified that American industries would be at a great disadvantage in foreign competition with any reduction of the present duties. Mr. Herr said that in England the companies in which he is interested pay just about half what they have to pay in this country for labor. In France the labor cost is below that of England, and Germany is even less than that of France. In Germany the rates do not exceed an average of 40 per cent of the American wage, and in many kinds of skilled labor the German wage is even less than 40 per cent that of the American wage.

If the American tariff is lowered to force direct competition with the products of Europe, Mr. Herr said his company would either have to reduce wages in its American plants to the level of European wages or else close its factories in this country and supply the American market with the product of its European factories. The Westinghouse Co. also has a factory in Canada, which is working under a protective duty against all countries, except England, of 27.5 per cent on electrical machinery. Even at that rate, according to Mr. Herr, the Canadian company is experiencing severe competition from the Germans, the Swedish, the French, and other exporters of electrical machinery. Exports of electrical machinery from this country are largely patented articles, which do not have to come in competition with the electrical machinery of foreign countries.

The Westinghouse Electric Co. employs between 18,000 and 20,000 persons in this country. Altogether there are between 75,000 and 100,000 men in the electrical industries of the United States. The General Electric Co. employs approximately 35,000 men, according to Mr. Francis C. Pratt, who appeared before the Finance Committee on behalf of that company.

Mr. Pratt stated that American wages are at least 100 per cent higher than foreign wages, taking as a basis of comparison the average paid by the General Electric Co. in its American and British factories for January, 1912. He stated that the General Electric Co. has a fairly complete means of comparing the cost of production in foreign countries and in the United States. That company has also found that the cost of material as well as labor is much lower abroad. A comparison of the cost of pig iron at the British factory of the General Electric Co. and its plant in Schenectady, N. Y., last summer showed that the company was actually purchasing pig iron delivered at its British factory for about 25 per cent less than it was paying in Schenectady.

In reply to the direct question as to whether the General Electric Co. would undertake to supply the American market from its foreign factories in case the present duty is lowered, Mr. Pratt declared that there was not the slightest doubt in his mind that if the duty is substantially reduced it would be an invitation to increase the amount of wages paid and the amount of new plants erected abroad and to make a corresponding decrease in this country. When asked further if this meant a complete substitution of the capital and the labor in this country by the labor abroad, Mr. Pratt declared he could see no other outcome than that the result would be an absolute substitution and a total loss of the industry in this country.

Explaining the difference between the cost of production in the United States and abroad, Mr. Pratt said:

> The great difference in the cost of production between the European countries and this country is wages. If we are going to reduce the cost of production in this country, there is just one thing in a broad way that we can do to get it down, and that is to revise our labor charge. Therefore we are protecting that labor charge with this protective tariff more preeminently than any other item that goes into the cost of production. You take the tariff in Germany. You do not hear talk there—at least I have not when I have been over—about protecting any particular class, protecting the labor. They are protecting German trade, and they are doing it very effectively. Their tariff is such that where they are good manufacturers—and they are rapidly becoming exceedingly good manufacturers in almost every line—their tariff is high enough so that with their very low labor others can not import there. They do not allow their domestic costs to go up so as to meet the limit of the tariff, but there is a concentrated effort to keep their cost of production down, so that they shall not only control their domestic market, but they shall control the export markets of the world. I think these statements in regard to the German wages being less than English wages are entirely sound. The result is that the cost of production in Germany is low, and it gives them an advantage in the export markets of the world which is tremendous, and at the same time they do control for their own manufacturers their domestic market.

HARDWARE.

American manufacturers of hardware complained to the committee that the reduction of the duty on their products from 45 to 25 per cent, as proposed by the basket paragraph, will seriously handicap that industry in this country. The American Hardware Manufacturers' Association fears that the proposed tariff reduction would force some manufacturers to remove their plants to foreign territory if they could not secure a reduction in the wages paid American workmen to correspond with the reduction of the duty on their products. As in other metal products, the principal difference in the cost of production of hardware in this country and abroad is the labor cost.

The average hourly wage paid in the Russell & Erwin plant, which produces locks, latches, keys, and other builders' hardware, is 20 cents for day workers and 19 and a fraction cents for pieceworkers. The average in England for those engaged in the manufacture of locks, latches, keys, and so forth, as published in Standard Time Rates of Wages in the United Kingdom, October 1, 1910, was the equivalent of 8.3 cents per hour.

A comparison of the foreign selling price of hardware shows that the French, German, and English manufacturers sell their products for even less than the American manufacturer can afford to make similar articles, with no allowance for profit in the American cost. It is apparent from these figures that the foreigner could well afford to pay 25 per cent, or even 45 per cent, duty and then successfully compete with the American manufacturer in this country:

I think the following statement, made to the Finance Committee by the American Hardware Co., is particularly applicable to the general tariff situation at this time, and I want to call it to the special attention of the Senate. The statement is as follows:

Our attitude in the entire matter of tariff revision is one of agnosticism—we simply do not know. We do not know, except in the most general way, what the European costs of production are; we do not know what our foreign competitors pay for raw material or for labor; we do not know what rate of duty measures the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad assures the present standard of wages in the industries in which we are interested and allows a reasonable profit without permitting the oppression of the consumer. Knowledge of all these facts should precede the fixing of any tariff rates either higher or lower than those now in force.

Therefore, in conclusion, we reaffirm our belief in the Tariff Board, or some similar governmental body, as the only agency able to collect and digest the requisite data, and we record our conviction that tariff changes should be based upon the findings of that body. We protest against the fixing of schedules arbitrarily and without foreknowledge of their effects, and we declare our readiness to accept as just and final rates of duty established in accordance with the conclusions of the Tariff Commission.

TEXTILE MACHINES.

A representative of the American Textile Machine Works stated to the Finance Committee that their rate of wages is 2½ times that paid in Saxony for the same class of labor and that it costs twice as much to build a textile machine in the United States as in Chemnitz, for instance. In addition to this handicap, the American manufacturers are put to the additional disadvantage by the frequency with which importers resort to undervaluation to avoid payment of the proper tariff duty.

Mr. Ferdinand Thum, representing the Textile Machine Works of Reading, Pa., presented affidavits to the committee from employees of his works who had also worked in Germany, showing that they are receiving in this country from 2¼ to almost 6 times the amount of wages that were paid them in Germany. These affidavits are to be found on pages 1032 and 1033 of the hearings before the Committee on Finance.

METAL PATTERNS.

Mr. James Wilson, president of the Pattern Makers' League of North America, appeared before the Finance Committee to protest against paragraph 66, which would reduce the duty on metal patterns from 45 to 25 per cent. Mr. Wilson asserted that if the duty is reduced pattern makers in this country will be up against the same condition that they had previous to the enactment of the Payne bill, when they had to compete with European pattern makers. He declared that there is not a country in the world which pays to its pattern makers one-third the wage the pattern makers in the United States receive, which is an average of about $24 a week. Even under the present duty, 22 per cent of all the pattern makers in the United States are unemployed at this time owing to the depression in that business. There are between 11,000 and 12,000 men employed in the pattern-making industry, all of them being highly skilled mechanics.

The rate of wages paid pattern makers in foreign countries is as follows:

Rate of wages paid pattern makers in foreign countries.

	Per week.
France	$10.80–$14.40
Great Britain	6.00– 10.00
Germany (Berlin)	10.50– 13.50
Holland	6.00– 7.50
Hungary	9.00– 12.00
Spain	6.00– 7.00
Sweden	8.00
Switzerland	6.00– 10.00
Russia	6.00

COATED ZINC AND TIN.

The reduction of the tariff on coated zinc and tin by the act of 1909 shows the effect of opening the American market to wider foreign competition. The importation of coated zinc sheet in 1905 was 36,000 pounds. In 1910, under a 50 per cent tariff reduction, this importation increased to 334,607 pounds, and 1911 to 434,310 pounds, or 30 per cent of the entire consumption of the country. Under the Dingley law the cost of delivering coated zinc from Peru, Ill., to the Atlantic seaboard was $10.72, as compared with the German cost of $11.31. Under the act of 1909 the German cost was reduced to $9.56, enabling the foreigner to undersell his American competitor. The tariff on coated zinc shows how seriously a change in the rates of duty affect even a small industry.

FREE LIST.

[Paragraphs 67 to 73, inclusive.]

Now I come to the free list. It is so utterly indefensible I am astounded that anyone who professes to have the interest of his country at heart should advocate a policy so ruinous to American industries. The pending bill proposes free trade for millions of dollars worth of products of American factories, while at the same time levying a tax upon raw material entering into those products. No industry can long survive in the United States under such conditions. The American manufacturer will have to do one of three things—either he will have to decrease his wage scale to correspond with that of the foreign manufacturer who is to have free access to the American market, or he will have to close his factory entirely, or else he will be compelled to move his industry to a foreign field, where he can get his labor and raw materials at the same price as his competitor.

The free list of the pending bill serves notice on every American manufacturer that as soon as his industry proves to be a success a similar fate is in store for him. It penalizes the American manufacturer for the success and prosperity which enables him to pay the American workman the highest wage in the world.

Already American manufacturers have invested millions of dollars for the establishment of industries in Europe owing to the cheaper cost of production abroad and the freedom there from the assaults of American politicians. The products of these expatriated industries are even now becoming serious competitors with the products of those American industries that have remained loyal to their country and their flag. Are we to place a premium on the removal of industries from the United States to foreign soil and reward those who desert their country at the expense of those who are endeavoring to withstand hostile tariff legislation in the hope that the American people will realize the fallacy of an unwise revision before it is too late?

Except for iron, zinc, and tungsten bearing ores, every item on the free list of the pending bill is the product of duty-bearing raw material. How can the Democratic Party make satisfactory explanation to the American workmen for placing their products on the free list in open competition with the products of cheaper foreign labor?

Heading the column of manufactured products on the Democratic free list are cotton ties placed there for the sole benefit of the southern planter. I have searched the free list in vain to find any trace of agricultural implements, in which farmers throughout the entire country are interested. I remember with what great acclaim agricultural implements were included in the so-called "farmers' free list" last session. Why has the Democratic Party so soon lost interest in the American farmer and forgotten him in its free-list distribution under the pending bill? Is the southern cotton planter any more entitled to free cotton ties than the grain farmer of the North and West is to free harvesters and binders? So completely has the farmer been forgotten in this bill that there is serious question as to whether the 25 per cent basket clause duty does not include many agricultural implements that now pay a duty of only 15 per cent under the act of 1909.

MACHINE TOOLS.

No greater injustice is done any American industry by the pending bill than that which it is proposed the machine-tool builders of this country shall suffer for their success and giving American-made tools a name and a fame throughout the world. The machine-tool industry is one of the oldest and most diversified in the United States. It is likewise one of the least organized industries in the country, there being no combinations or trusts that I know of which control any considerable part of this industry. In all, there are about 225 American concerns engaged in the business of building machine tools. This industry has an annual output valued at about $40,000,000. Machine-tool factories are located in 18 States, as follows: Ohio has 58; New York, 22; Connecticut, 22; Massachusetts, 39; Illinois, 15; Pennsylvania, 16; Rhode Island, 6; Michigan, 8; Wisconsin, 10; Indiana, 7; Delaware, 3; Vermont, 4; New Jersey, 7; Maryland, 1; New Hampshire, 2; Iowa, 1; Maine, 2; Missouri, 1.

The following tabulation of these companies, according to their capitalization, shows that the industry is not a monopolistic one in any sense: Only 9 out of the 225 machine-tool concerns have a capitalization of more than $1,000,000 each; 3 have a capital of between $750,000 and $1,000,000 each; 11 between $500,000 and $750,000; 19 between $300,000 and $500,000; 20 between $200,000 and $300,000; 26 between $125,000 and $200,000; 18 between $75,000 and $125,000; 17 between $50,000 and $75,000; 20 between $35,000 and $50,000; 21 between $20,000 and $35,000; 11 between $10,000 and $20,000; 6 between $5,000 and $10,000; 1 between $3,000 and $5,000; and 42 not rated.

Statistics gathered from 67 out of the 225 machine-tool concerns in the United States show that for the last 10 years their average earnings have been a little less than 9 per cent on the capital invested, which certainly is not an excessive profit. These 67 concerns represent a capitalization of $21,000,000, out of a total capitalization of $40,000,000, for the 225 machine-tool companies in the United States. It is evident, therefore, that the average earnings of less than 9 per cent is representative of the entire industry. No definite figures have been obtainable as yet concerning the earnings of German machine-tool builders, but representatives of the American industry declared to the Finance Committee that they had evidence that the Germans declared larger dividends than American machine-tool shops.

The fact that American machine-tool builders have been able by their superior ingenuity to build up an export trade of approximately four and a half to five million dollars a year has so excited free traders of the country that they now propose to tear down this wonderful American industry which has been made possible by a protective-tariff system.

Germany, with its cheaper labor, cheaper raw material, and lower freight rates, is already becoming a serious and most aggressive competitor of American machine-tool builders. In fact, American manufacturers are able to hold the foreign trade they now have only by specializing in certain tools that the foreign builders have not yet been able to duplicate to any considerable extent. As soon as the German manufacturer succeeds in reproducing an American machine tool he can undersell the product of this country and practically force it from the foreign market. It is only by keeping ahead of the foreign builders in inventions that the American manufacturer has been able to make any headway with his export trade.

Every report from abroad shows that German manufacturers are rapidly catching up with the American machine-tool builders and that in the near future there will be greater need for a tariff that will protect the American machine-tool builder in his home market than ever before. Confronted with this situation, it seems to me the heighth of folly to now place machine tools on the free list and open wide the American market to foreign products which are bound to flood this country and force into idleness thousands of American workingmen who are now receiving the best wage in the world.

Mr. Frederick A. Geier, who appeared before the Finance Committee as the representative of the 225 American machine-tool manufacturers, clearly pointed out that exports to Europe are now largely confined to highly specialized and highly organized machine tools, such as the German manufacturer can not make as yet. He declared, however, that Europeans are making excellent machines of the kind and type the American builder shipped abroad 10 years ago, and that those machines are being sold very much under the American cost. Comparatively few of the American machine-tool builders are engaged in the manufacture of the highly specialized machines that are now exported from this country.

The simpler types of American tools, such as planes, shapers, lathes, and drills, which are made by 85 per cent of the American companies engaged in the machine-tool industry, can not be sold in Germany now under normal trade conditions abroad, as German machine tools of similar type bought at a less cost have replaced those of American manufacture in the European market. Without the tariff the cheaper-made foreign machine tools could be dumped on the American market in direct competition with the products of fully 85 per cent of the machine-tool builders of this country.

The report made by Capt. Godfrey L. Carden, special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, fully corroborates the statement of American machine-tool builders that they have only been able to make any progress in foreign markets by specializing in their products. Capt. Carden, in his report on machine-tool trade in Germany, France, Switzerland, Italy, and United Kingdom (p. 11), says:

> Broadly speaking, the best grades of American machine tools excel both in design and workmanship, and in the accuracy of working results, the foreign-built tools. There are, however, a number of foreign machine-tool establishments which are approximating very closely to standard American work, and there are several plants where the designs and workmanship are of exceptionally high order. As a rule the medium size high-grade American machine tool brings more money abroad than does the foreign machine of the same size.

Capt. Carden then goes on to make this statement, which I want to call particularly to your attention:

> American machine tools are bought abroad, as a rule, only when possessing superior merit. The moment a foreign tool approximates in accuracy to an American machine tool the foreigner will buy the products of his own country; this is natural, and to be expected.

Again, on page 15 of his report, Capt. Carden says:

> If German machine-tool builders were able to specialize as do many American firms, the writer predicts that it would not be long before the Germans would be abreast of some of the leading designers of the United States. In the construction of machine tools the Germans have rapidly acquired technical knowledge, and already they can boast in many instances of possessing fine shop organization. The German builders have everything practically but territory, and with territory the ability to specialize. Their country is too circumscribed to make it possible for a new firm to hope to live on domestic trade. Export business is therefore the life of the nation, and every thought and every energy is accordingly directed in the interest of export.

In his report on the machine-tool trade in Belgium, Capt. Carden, who made a two years' study of that industry in Europe, says of a shop in Belgium:

> There is hardly any doubt but what the Remicourt shops are turning out 85 separators per day at a very much lower figure than would be possible at the present time in the United States. American manufacturers are able to hold their own in foreign competition so long as our technical knowledge is superior and our shop efficiency greater. * * * The Melotte equipment, composed as it is almost exclusively of American machine tools and operated on American lines, gives the Remicourt shops practically all the advantages of an American plant plus the further advantages afforded by a lower wage scale.

As Capt. Carden's report indicates, foreign machine-tool builders now possess practically every advantage that the American manufacturer has, with the additional advantage of cheaper labor. It is apparent, therefore, that the American manufacturer will be able to retain his home market and pay high wages to his workmen only so long as he has a tariff to protect him against the products of cheaper European labor.

In this connection I want to call your attention to the fact that the actual labor cost of machine tools is from 60 to 75 per cen of the total cost. This indicates how all important the wage scale is to the American machine-tool builders. Capt. Carden's reports show in detail the wages paid workmen in the machine-tool industry abroad. His reports give an average of 14¾ cents an hour for foreign machine operators. Reports from 67 machine-tool concerns of the United States show an average wage for their operators of 27.9 cents an hour, or practically double the wage paid foreign operators. Capt. Carden called attention to the fact that workmen in one of the highest grade machine-tool factories in Belgium receive less than $1 a day for doing the same class of work that American machine-tool hands are paid $3.50 for doing.

The following table shows the average rate of wages in cents per hour paid in European countries and in the United States in 1908, since which time there has been an increase of from 8 to 10 per cent in some European works:

Machine-tool builders.	Machinists.	Tool-makers.	Handy men.

[1] Machine-tool industry still in its infancy.
[2] On piecework these rates may be increased 30 to 40 per cent.

Direct evidence that the cost of labor in American machine-tool shops is fully 50 per cent greater than that employed in foreign shops was submitted to the Finance Committee by Mr. Frank C. B. Page, vice president of the E. W. Bliss Co., which operates large machine-tool shops in this country and in Europe, the latter shops being located in Paris and London. Mr. Page submitted the following table of comparative wages paid in the Brooklyn and Paris shops of his company:

Average wage paid per hour.

	Brooklyn.	Paris.
Machinists	$0.29 5/16	$0.17 1/10
Die makers	.36 2/10	.18 3/16
Blacksmiths	.37 1/16	.22 1/10
Laborers	.20	.11

In showing that the cost of labor in this country is almost twice what it is in France, Germany, and England, Mr. Page stated that labor averages 70 per cent of the total cost of the products of his factories, and that therefore American companies could not compete with foreign makers if the present tariff is removed.

There could be only one condition on which we would be able to stay in business—and that is the reduction of wages to the same level as prevails in European countries. We believe it would be a question of paying less for labor or not employing labor at all. Having factories in both France and England, we might be forced to do all of our manufacturing in these plants in order to get the benefit of the low cost of labor to enable us to compete.

Mr. Hugh V. Reilly, representing the machinists' unions of New Jersey, including 5,000 workmen, appeared before the Finance Committee to protest, in their behalf, against any reduction in the tariff that would force them to compete with cheaper European labor. The machinists of the country realize that placing machine tools on the free list will compel American builders to reduce their wage scale to meet foreign competition or else close their factories. In either event the American workmen will be the greatest sufferers.

We, as machinists, are not the only trade who are interested in this industry—

there are molders and pattern makers; and naturally, as the orders come in, or the orders are stopped, in the offices of these companies, their work, or our labor market, is bound to be affected. We can not afford, therefore, to look at this question of taking off the tariff with any other than feelings of alarm. We have never before been bothered with a question of this kind. We do not come here asking you men to put a tariff on our skill. We are well able to take care of that in our different trade unions. We can always take care of that. But we do not want to have markets taken from our employers. * * * We do not want to see the general industry hampered in any way. As a general proposition we are opposed to it.

Another advantage that the foreign machine-tool builder has is the cheaper raw material. The German tool builder gets the same raw materials free of duty on which the American manufacturer, even under the pending bill, would have to pay from 10 to 25 per cent duty. For example, $1,000,000 worth of ball bearings are imported into the United States annually, a large part of which are used in machine tools. The pending bill proposes that the product of the foreign machine-tool builder, who has paid no duty on the ball bearings or other raw materials he uses, shall be put upon the free list in competition with the American-made machine tools that have had to bear the additional burden of a duty on ball bearings and other raw materials used in their manufacture in this country. How long does anyone expect an American industry to survive under this double disadvantage?

Another serious situation with which the American manufacturer has to contend is the skill and alertness with which foreign manufacturers imitate successful American products. No sooner does an American manufacturer place a new product on the market than the foreign manufacturers begin duplicating it. This is particularly true of American machinery, and more especially so of machine tools. Machines upon which American builders have spent years of study and thousands of dollars to perfect are speedily duplicated by German builders, who thus save great expense of inventing and developing these machines. It is conservatively estimated that 5 per cent of the total cost of producing American machine tools is due to the continuous work of inventing and developing machine tools. The foreign manufacturer expends little or nothing for that purpose, appropriating, as he does, the machine tools that American concerns have worked out to success.

American manufacturers complain that foreign patents give them little or no protection in the foreign field owing to the long litigations that result from any attempt to suppress foreign infringements. Patents are particularly of little avail in the machine industry, which is so old that practically all of its fundamental patents have expired. Only some of the elemental features of machine tools can be patented abroad, but it is especially difficult to obtain such patents, and still more difficult to protect them. In a number of European countries a patentee must establish a factory to manufacture his invention in the country where the patent is obtained within a certain time or else lose his right to such a patent in that country.

I have here several books illustrating the audacity and the extent to which foreign manufacturers go in their duplication of American machine tools. In these books the imitations are so perfect that you can hardly tell the difference between the machine manufactured in this country and the one manufactured in Germany. Page after page gives illustrations of American machines that have been copied almost exactly and to the smallest detail by foreign builders. To develop these machines American manufacturers have expended thousands and probably millions of dollars. At a minimum of expense the German manufacturer has succeeded in duplicating every one of these machines and placing them on the market in direct competition with the product of American ingenuity. So quickly does the German manufacturer adopt a successful American model that the manufacturer in this country now has little time in which to reap any benefits from his years of study and vast expense in perfecting his machines.

As soon as the German manufacturer reproduces an American machine he can drive the original American product from the market, owing to his cheaper cost of production. An instance of this is to be found in France, where German machines and tools already have taken the lead over American machines. In 1899 the United States exported to France machines and machinery to the value of 29,866,000 francs, while the German exports to France in the same year amounted to 23,815,000 francs. In 1910 the exports of machines and machinery by the United States to France amounted to 46,420,000 francs, while exports from Germany to France reached the vast sum of 111,931,000 francs.

The same is true of the exportation of American and German tools to Belgium. In 1906 the United States exported machine tools to Belgium weighing 487,497 kilos, while the German exportation to Belgium in that year amounted to 6,790,000 kilos. In 1908 the American exportations had advanced only to 659,584 kilos, while the German exportations had reached 10,497,000 kilos, the American trade in Belgium being less than 6 per cent that of Germany. Statistics show an increase in Germany's machinery exports of 1,000 per cent in 10 years.

It is true that American exports of metal-working machinery, including machine tools, have increased somewhat during the last three years. This has been due, however, as I pointed out before, to the success of American manufacturers in producing highly specialized machinery and to the fact that times have been exceedingly prosperous abroad during those years, while there has been a perceptible slump in the American market. Foreign manufacturers have been so overloaded with orders that they have been unable to take care of all the business that prosperity abroad has brought to them. American manufacturers have taken what advantage they could of this fact and have succeeded in increasing their exports by the fact that the dullness in the American market has given them the opportunity to fill foreign orders more quickly than could the overworked European manufacturers. This condition, however, is a temporary one, as everyone knows the foreign manufacturer will soon be able to take care of all his home trade, and then the American machine-tool builder will have to rely almost entirely upon the market of this country. If he is forced to meet the foreign manufacturer on free-trade terms in the United States, then the American market also will rapidly diminish to the American manufacturer.

The pending bill simply proposes to increase the market for European manufacturers by adding the United States to their territory without offering any compensation whatever in return to the American manufacturer.

There is not a paragraph in the entire bill that will add a single dollar in additional trade to the American manufacturer nor add a penny to the compensation of any American wage earner. Canada, for instance, would continue a tariff rate of 27½ per cent against American-made machine tools, while the markets of this country would be open free to the Canadian manufacturers of machine tools. American machine-tool builders submitted price lists to the Finance Committee showing that German manufacturers could sell machine tools in this country from 32 to 47 per cent less than the American builder could, if admitted free of duty.

Instead of the pending bill opening up the American market for free trade in machine tools to the amount of approximately $200,000 a year, it is more than likely that at least $10,000,000 worth of machinery, practically all of which may be classified as machine tools under recent interpretations of that term, will be brought into this country annually by this free-trade provision.

Ordinarily a machine tool has been interpreted to be a metal-cutting machine, but this has been broadened recently by Treasury decisions to include woodworking machinery and every type of machinery of that kind. Therefore the proposition is not simply one of putting $191,000 worth of foreign products on the free list, but is one to admit $10,000,000 worth of foreign products free of duty. Such a proposition alone would reduce the revenues of the country four and one-half million dollars.

Many machines that formerly were classed as machinery and imported at 45 per cent duty have been reclassified by customs officials as machine tools and admitted at the 30 per cent duty. With the increasing pressure that is being brought to bear to broaden the definition of machine tools it is quite possible that in a short time a greater part of the machinery imports even under the present law will be entered as machine tools.

The authors of the pending bill estimate that the reduction of the basket clause under which the great bulk of machinery is now entered from 45 to 25 per cent will increase the importations of machinery to $10,500,000. If machine tools are put on the free list, additional incentive will be given to foreign manufacturers to have their products entered under such classification. It is quite certain therefore that the estimate of $10,000,000 free importation under that classification is entirely conservative.

Let me read from an address which Dr. Ing. G. Schlesinger, professor in the Technical University of Berlin, delivered at the annual convention of German machine builders in Berlin on April 6, 1911. Dr. Schlesinger took for the subject of his address, "The position of the German machine-tool industry in the world market." I quote from these portions of his address which apply to the present discussion:

> For the most part, the competition is confined only between Germany and the United States. And therefore we are confining our present comparison between these two countries.
> The statistics of the last 10 years show that the German export of machine tools to the whole world was 11,000 tons in 1900 and has increased to 58,000 tons in 1910, while the imports from America, which were approximately 7,000 tons in 1900, were decreased to 2,000 tons in 1901 and increased again in 1906 to a maximum of 8,800 tons, averaging 5,500 tons per year.
> The reason for the present small export of German machine tools to America is the American tariff, which was formerly 45 per cent and is now 30 per cent ad valorem. The German machine-tool builder must, therefore, aim to build his machines so good and so cheap that they can climb over the American tariff wall, which is already happening in some instances.
> The comparison of export and import figures show that in the case of the German machine-tool builders in most types of machines they can claim equality with the American product, since most export markets welcome our machines and purchase them in big quantities.
> To-day the Germans are independent and stronger than their American competitors.
> A reawakening of the German machine-tool industry resulted from their following very closely the American example in the construction of their well-built and durable machines. Machine tools of large proportions, used especially by mining and rolling mills, also shipyards, because of their more scientific requirements, were the first to compete with American imports into the home market and have to-day eliminated this competition completely.
> No one can blame the German machine-tool manufacturers if they take a good thing wherever they find it. In the hard fight for existence the question of the origin of any idea or design fades into insignificance.
> In the case of boring machines, small and medium sizes, American competition was forced to completely withdraw.
> On those machines on which the German makers compete with American product the prices are insufficient, but they will not be increased until Germany increases her schedule of tariff on the import of American tools into Germany.

I believe the American tool industry will suffer more than any other American industry if the pending bill should become a law. I am utterly at a loss for a reason why the authors of this bill picked out the machine-tool industry as a victim of its free-trade fallacy. What reason is there for protecting the automobile industry with a duty of 40 per cent and at the same time taking away every vestige of protection that the machine-tool builder has had? These machine-tool builders voluntarily agreed to a reduction of the tariff on their products from 45 to 30 per cent under the act of 1909. Now it is proposed to take away even that 30 per cent protection, which is all that saves the American manufacturer from a ruinous competition with the cheaper products of Europe. Machine tools are made of the same raw material and by the same class of labor as practically every machinery product that is retained on the dutiable list by the pending bill. In addition to automobiles, the bill protects bicycles and motorcycles at 40 per cent and every kind of machinery used in the textile and rubber industries at 25 per cent. Here are some of the machines that the Underwood bill retains on its dutiable list, while putting machine tools on the free list:

> Machines for shoemaking, paper and pulp, leather working, confectionery, cotton, woolen, knitting, bottle making, steam pumps, electrical machinery, water meters, adding machines, sugar, rolling mill, rubber, road making, rock drilling, mining, pneumatics, hydraulic presses, cotton ginning, oil well, agricultural, dairy, laundry, traction engines, cement, brickmaking, metal molding, rotary blowers, ventilating, can making, hat making, straw braiding, steam shovels, barb wire, wire weaving, dredging cranes, jib cranes, traveling cranes, locomotive, hoisting machinery, elevators, conveyer, grain elevating, flour making, stone crushing, internal-combustion engines, metal drawing, tube drawing, wire drawing, pin making, windmills, hot-air engines, chain making, glass making, paper-box making, envelope making, weighing machines, scales, paint making, chemical machinery, goldsmith machinery, button making, butchers, coffee machinery, dental machinery, telescopes, microscopes, laboratory apparatus, fertilizer, filtering machinery, telephone machines, telegraph machines, flying machines, injectors, water wheels, ice making, vacuum cleaning, air compressors, bakers' machinery, cottonseed oil, cereal making, gun-making, nail making, nippers and pliers, and many others we have not had time to list.

As I said before, the definition of machine tools has become somewhat hazy, and it is almost certain that with the temptation of a free list there will be a tremendous effort made to have various other machines classed as machine tools along with metal-working machines.

The wonderful development of the machine-tool industry in this country has really been the basis for the great advancement the United States has made in all lines of manufactures. As a witness before the Finance Committee well said:

> You can not operate a railroad, you can not run a steamship, you can not have a telegraph or telephone or an electric light, you could not plow the fields in the West, you could not do any of the mechanical things that are now going on in this country, that would develop the United States to its present position, if you did not have machine tools. Take away the machine tools and America would be powerless to protect itself against foreign invasion. There is no battleship that goes out that is not fundamentally dependent upon the use of machine tools.

Is an industry that made all these things possible to be destroyed because it has made a successful effort to maintain a foreign trade?

German labor is not only cheaper than that of the United States, but is also rapidly becoming fully as efficient. Germany has a scientific system of industrial education that far surpasses the vocational education which is really just beginning in the United States. The little Kingdom of Prussia, with approximately a population of one-third of the United States and one-thirteenth of its area, has 400,000 young people between the ages of 14 and 18 attending schools for industrial training during the year 1908. This industrial school attendance is equal to 13½ per cent of the total population of Prussia. Compared with this, the United States Bureau of Education reports that for 1906 only 1¾ per cent of our population received a vocational education between the ages of 12 and 22. This vocational education of its young people in the trades has become a powerful factor in the wonderful advancement that Germany has made industrially during the last decade. It is a factor that soon must be met in the United States by a similar system of educating our young people along vocational lines as well as in professions. We must train our young people to work with their hands as well as with their heads. It is even more important in the prosperity of the United States that the great majority of our young people should be given adequate industrial educations than that they be educated along nonproductive lines as lawyers, doctors, dentists, theologians, or even as statesmen. It is highly essential, therefore, that the American market should be adequately protected until the growing generations of this country are educated to compete successfully with the skilled European workmen who have had the advantage of a vocational education.

PRINTING PRESSES.

The printing-press industry of the United States is in the same situation regarding foreign competition as is the machine-tool industry of this country. Foreign manufacturers are showing the same skill in their duplication of American printing presses as they are in the reproduction of American machine tools. I have here a book with illustrations of a large number of American printing presses that have been imitated to the minutest detail by foreign manufacturers, particularly those of Germany, where these presses can be made at a considerably less cost than in the United States.

The printing-press industry is one upon whose product at least 75 per cent to 80 per cent is spent for labor, and 20 per cent to 25 per cent for material, nearly all of which is subject to duty.

The American manufacturers of printing presses employ thousands of skilled mechanics, whose average wage per hour is 37 cents against 14 cents for the foreign mechanics of the same class; therefore, to abolish or reduce the tariff means a serious blow to this industry and must necessarily entail a great reduction in rate of wages paid to its workmen.

American manufacturers have spent vast sums of money and great skill and industry in experimenting, developing, and perfecting their presses, and this development, which adds so much to the welfare of the printing trade with its vast influence on our material and intellectual development, must stop if our market, the best in the world, is to be thrown open to our foreign competitors, who avail themselves of our designs without bearing any of their expense of development, and then, with this very low wage scale, threaten to invade our country with their presses. In fact, at the present time, they are beginning to introduce their foreign-made copies of American presses, and even with the duty and transportation against them, they are competing in price with us in our own country.

The following table shows the average rate of wages paid per hour to skilled labor by the printing-press manufacturers of the United States in comparison with the average rate per hour paid in foreign countries to the same class of skilled labor, the foreign wages being taken from Capt. Carden's report:

Exports of printing presses are largely confined to special machines which have not as yet been copied by the foreign builder, whose competition on standard machines, many of the designs of which have been copied almost exactly from American presses, is so sharp by reason of the low wage rate in foreign countries that the American builders can not compete at all as exporters.

SEWING MACHINES.

Evidence submitted to the Finance Committee in regard to sewing machines shows clearly that the tariff has nothing to do with the selling price of those machines in this country. This is equally true of innumerable other items upon which a duty has been placed for the protection of American workingmen. Sewing-machine manufacturers frankly admitted to the committee that machines costing from $10 to $20 wholesale are retailed at from $45 to $75. With these enormous profits it is evident, therefore, that the tariff has nothing whatever to do with the selling price of sewing machines. The tariff is important, however, to protect American workingmen against competition with the cheaper labor of Europe. The committee was informed that labor in American sewing-machine factories receives practically double the wage paid similar employees in the foreign factories. The 30 per cent duty on sewing machines at present is hardly sufficient to represent the difference in labor cost between the United States and Europe.

The chief beneficiary of free trade in sewing machines would be the Singer Sewing Machine Co. Already this company has established a large factory in Glasgow and is reported to be preparing to erect the largest sewing-machine factory in the world in Russia. To remove the tariff on sewing machines would make an opportunity for the Singer Sewing Machine Co. to supply the American market with machines made by the cheaper labor in its foreign factories. It is absolutely certain that the removal of the 30 per cent duty would not result in any benefit whatever to the consumer, who has to pay three or four times the cost of manufacturing machines in this country owing to the great profits demanded by the sewing-machine companies. These large gross profits are due to their extravagant expenditures for selling and distributing sewing machines.

A removal of the duty on sewing machines would put out of business nearly all the independent manufacturers in this country, giving the Singer Sewing Machine Co. practically a monopoly on the American market owing to its opportunity to manufacture machines in its foreign factories.

TYPEWRITERS.

The typewriter industry is purely of an American origin, and is not a little industry by any means. The Underwood bill places typewriters on the free list. A considerable proportion of the raw material used in their manufacture is imported, and a duty is imposed on all of this raw product, while the finished machine is put on the free list. There are 15 distinct types of high-grade typewriting machines manufactured in the United States by as many independent companies, having no relation with each other. The total capitalization of these companies is approximately $55,000,000, and their combined production about 450,000 machines, the retail value of which is approximately $40,000,000. The industry gives employment altogether to nearly 28,000 persons. These companies pay from $3 to $3.50 per 9-hour day for the skilled labor, and their unskilled labor averages $2.25. They pay out nearly $9,000,000 annually for labor. In Germany, which has become the chief competitor in the production of typewriters, in the Chemnitz district, where one of the improved typewriters is made, the average wages for skilled labor are approximately 84 cents for a 9-hour day, or $1.20 for a 10-hour day, which they are required to work, against the $3 to $3.50 per day in the United States. Some of the skilled laborers there only receive from 72 cents to 80 cents for a 9-hour day. At Dusseldorf $1.71 is paid for skilled labor.

When we take into consideration the fact that between 70 and 80 per cent of the cost of manufacturing a typewriter is paid out to the labor employed, it can easily be appreciated what would be the result of putting typewriters on the free list. The Germans have sent their men over here to learn how to make the typewriters, and they use the same machinery that is used in this country. The conditions prevailing in England and France are similar to those existing in Germany, and if the American field is opened to the free importation of typewriters it is fair to assume that impetus will be given to this industry in England and France, as well as in Germany, and it can not help to react against the American manufacturers. Moreover, it should be noted that, with the exception of England, practically all of the European countries impose duties upon typewriters which the American manufacturers have to pay in competition in the European markets. Hence, if typewriters are placed on the free list here it will result in discrimination against American manufacturers in favor of their European competitors.

A typewriter consists of over 1,000 parts. In that sense it is complicated, something like a watch, and requires skilled labor. American machines are copied in Germany and sold under different names. The Germans are selling their machines in South American markets to-day at from $43 to $47 each. The development of this industry in Germany has taken place in the last seven or eight years, and as a result they have excluded the importation of machines from the United States. In France they are making only one machine and that is the first experiment, and the same is true of England, but they will rapidly develop the industry, as has been the case in Germany.

In a few years Germany reduced the American exports to South America 42 per cent as a result of her competition. Until recent years the typewriters in this country have supplied the world, with little or no competition. Now, however, they are meeting with keen competition, particularly in Germany, which country is now manufacturing high-grade machines, and it is only a matter of time when the Germans will approach the same degree of perfection as the American manufacturers have reached. A representative of a typewriter company, speaking before the Finance Committee, declared that—> there is not a single company that sells typewriters abroad for less money than in the United States.

And he added that there was not one to his knowledge that did not sell its product for more money abroad than it gets at home.

CUT NAILS, SPIKES, NUTS, WASHERS, AND HORSESHOES.

[Paragraph 70.]

The House bill puts spikes, nuts, and washers on the free list, with a duty of 15 per cent on bolts. All of the establishments manufacturing those items, with the exception of spikes, to some extent are small concerns as compared with the larger steel corporations. There are about 35 of these manufacturers, with a capital of about $50,000,000. Spikes are used altogether by the railroads, and the nuts and washers are also used principally by the railroads. Putting these nuts on the free list might benefit the railroads altogether at the expense of the manufacturer, and as one of the manufacturers stated:

> Coming at a time when there is practically no profit in the manufacture of bolts, nuts, and rivets, it seems like hitting a man when he is down.

Horseshoes are put on the free list by the Underwood bill. This would be no benefit to the consumer. A horseshoe now costs at wholesale about three and a half cents, and the usual price in the country charged by the blacksmith for shoeing a horse and furnishing the shoes is $1. The change in the duty from the present law would make a difference of about three-quarters of a cent on each horseshoe and would not benefit the consumer in the slightest. There are large factories for producing horseshoes in Canada, and they could easily market their surplus in the United States, whereas they have a protective tariff of 30 per cent. Putting horseshoes on the free list might help the jobber and the retailer and the blacksmith somewhat, but it would be no benefit to the ordinary consumer, which is plainly demonstrated by the fact that when horseshoes were sold for 50 cents a keg higher than they are now the charge for shoeing a horse was just the same. The existing price, according to Mr. Wheelwright, of the Old Dominion Iron and Nail Works Co., has not been changed for 25 years. Asked if he could not reduce the wages in the manufacture of horseshoes, Mr. Wheelwright replied:

> I would not be able to reduce the wages, and I would simply have to quit. The wages could not be reduced.

COTTON TIES.

The provision of the House bill admitting cotton ties and strips of iron and steel for bailing purposes free of duty, strikes a blow at another branch of the iron and steel business. Those products are now dutiable at three-tenths of a cent per pound, or $6 per ton. The prosperous conditions abroad in the iron and steel business and the depressed condition in the United States have had a tendency to keep foreign producers from invading our markets to any great extent, because of the great demand at home for their goods. Some cotton ties were imported last year at a valuation of 1 cent per pound. Large manufacturers in this country state that they can not be produced here for that price, and they do not believe that they can be produced abroad either at such a figure, but they may be admitted at an undervaluation, which may account for it. The production of cotton ties last year was about 52,000 tons. They are very low now in price, which would appear to offer no excuse for placing them on the free list, and thus offer our markets as a dumping ground for foreign producers. Wages in this industry, as in other iron and steel industries, are two to three times greater than the rates paid in Europe, of which fact there can be no question. Hence to put an article of this kind on the free list simply means a great reduction in the wages or the closing of the mills.

Cotton ties are used almost exclusively in the Atlantic and Gulf States. They are manufactured nearly altogether in the north and central west. Comparing the freights available to foreigners with the freights available to American manufacturers, the inevitable result of placing them on the free list will be what it was under the Wilson tariff, and will close down all of the cotton tie mills and allow the foreigners to have a market to themselves. The ocean freights from Belgium, Germany, and Great Britain to Atlantic and Gulf ports is $2.50 per ton and less. The lowest rail-and-water freight rate obtainable from the Pittsburgh district to Galveston, Tex., on cotton ties, is $5.20 per net ton, and when shipped all rail the rate is $7.10 per net ton. Owing to the low sea freights available to foreign manufacturers, all the American manufacturers with few exceptions will be compelled to yield the seaboard markets to their foreign competitors, and the output of these commodities in our country will be proportionately reduced to such an extent as materially to increase the cost of the remaining output of American factories.

Mr. President, I have tried to take up every paragraph in this bill and call attention to the amount that is produced in this country of the items that fall under each of these paragraphs and compare the wages paid in foreign lands with those paid in this country, and I hope and trust that after the careful study and consideration of this bill by Senators they will hesitate to vote for a bill that on its face will work serious hardship on one million and a half American workmen and destroy the advancement of one of the greatest American industries.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator imagine that there is going to be any careful study of this question? Judging by the number of Senators who have been present and have listened to a most exhaustive and one of the best arguments that has ever been made in this Chamber upon this schedule, is it evident that it is going to receive any consideration or anything other than a mere vote upon it?

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Utah replies, I think it is not inapt to state the fact that we recognize the propriety of the criticism which has been made by the Senator from North Dakota, and I want the Senator from Utah to bear witness to the fact that we ourselves sought to arrange it that he would have the attention he is entitled to, but the Senator from Utah declined when the offer was made on our side. The Senator from Utah will remember that.

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was not criticizing. I was simply stating the facts as they appear. If the Senate must be kept here by constant roll calls, it is evidence of itself that very little interest is taken in this bill. The Senator has spoken here this afternoon when there were not four Senators present in the Senate to listen to him. He has discussed the bill in a most thorough manner and in a most masterly effort, and I presume very little of it in the RECORD will ever be read.

I simply speak of it, Mr. President, not in the sense of criticism, but to indicate to the Senator who was speaking that while he was trusting that we might have a careful consideration of this question the evidence before us was that it would have mighty little consideration.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish to be understood as taking issue with the Senator from North Dakota. On the contrary, as to the lack of attention the Senator from Utah was entitled to, I entirely agree with him, that there has not been such attention as there should have been.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that perhaps many of the Senators will read the speech in the RECORD, and perhaps study the figures. That is why I expressed the hope that they would. I have given a great deal of study to this question. I have gathered these facts, and they have not been gathered in a few hours nor in a day, but it has taken many days and many nights. I tried to be absolutely fair, gathering the facts from the best sources it has been possible to gather them from, and I say now to the Senate that in studying this bill from beginning to end, taking into consideration the reductions proposed, I can not see where the ultimate consumer is going to be benefited. The only effect it will have will be to destroy the manufacturers of this class of goods in this country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the absence of Senators from the Senate Chamber is by no means a reflection of the interest which they might have in this discussion under certain circumstances, but it is due to the fact that, while there is a great deal of protest to the contrary, nobody really expects any tariff bill which may come before us at this session to become a law, and if both sides would join with equal candor in that proposition it would not be necessary to stay here and carry on this useless discussion. We should pass the bills which must be passed and ought to be passed, and some of which must be passed, and go home.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose the Senator from Idaho means that no tariff bill passed will become a law because the President would veto it.

Mr. BORAH. I mean to say that the Republicans do not expect that any bill will be framed by the other side which will meet the measure of protection that they want, and the other side is not, in my opinion, very anxious that any bill they pass shall become a law. I do not believe that either side has any expectation of any of these measures becoming a law. And one side is not very much more disappointed than the other.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what the Senator means by "the other side." When he says "the other side," does he mean the Democratic side?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I mean the Democratic side, as I am on the Republican side.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that he is speaking without authority. I do not know anybody on this side who is not anxious that these bills shall become law, and I will say to the Senator that if they do not become law it will be either because of the action of the Republican side in this Chamber or of the Republican President.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not expect, however, that any bill that may pass will become a law, does he?

Mr. SIMMONS. I expect that this bill will pass this body, and I expect it will go to the President of the United States. What he will do with it the Senator can tell better than I can.

Mr. BORAH. It will be a great consolation to the Senators on the other side of the Chamber that it will go to a Republican President.

Mr. SMOOT. And also a great consolation if it is vetoed.

Mr. BACON. The statement of either of these Senators is not only without warrant but is absolutely wide of the fact.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I think I have had a little better opportunity to judge in regard to the sentiment of the Democrats than either of the Senators, although they appear to belong to parties practically differing from each other.

Mr. BORAH. I do not——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me until I finish my statement. Then I will be glad to hear from him.

Mr. BORAH. I will wait.

Mr. BACON. I have had a pretty good opportunity to know what are the attitude and desire of the Democrats, and I can say with the utmost confidence that the statement, whether made directly or by inuendo, that the Democrats are not in favor of this legislation which they are now proposing to pass is absolutely not only without foundation but incorrect. I have been in very close confidential relationship with my colleagues on this side of the Chamber; we have the opportunity for an interchange of views under circumstances where each can judge of the sincerity of the others, and I speak in the utmost confidence and in the sincerity which is due from one speaking in this place when I say that the purpose is to do all that is within our power to pass these tariff bills, and not only that, but we will be greatly disappointed if they do not become law.

Why should the Senator think we do not desire that this metal-schedule bill shall become a law, when it rests with such burden upon those whom we represent, when there is not a single Democratic Senator who does not represent constituents who rest under very great burdens on account of the present law? which burdens would be greatly relieved by this bill if it should be passed.

Not only so, but among the great body of the American people there is not a man who rides on a railroad who does not have to pay an increased cost on account of the cost of the iron rails which are made more costly by the tariff on rails. The Senator knows that, and to say that we are not sincere in this—I am astonished that the Senator should say anything of the kind, unless he can give us any authority for it. If the Senator knows of any single Senator on this side of the Chamber whom he can charge with insincerity in this matter, I hope he will not hesitate from any feeling of delicacy to mention his name.

Mr. BORAH. I am not going to name any individual Senator. Neither did I have any individual Senator in mind. I was speaking of what every one understands to be the method when it is determined to do or not to do a certain thing.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator does not know of any——

Mr. BORAH. I do not modify my views at all when I say that neither side of the Chamber has given any evidence at all during this session that they expected any tariff legislation to result in law, and every move has been in harmony with the theory that none of this legislation would ripen into law.

Mr. BACON. What are the devices?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Of course if the Senator from Utah has the floor I will yield to him.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not the floor. I yielded the floor.

Mr. BACON. Then I wish to reply to the Senator from Idaho. What does the Senator from Idaho allude to when he says every device has been adopted looking to the direction of legislation which will result in a failure to accomplish anything?

Mr. BORAH. That would necessitate, to some extent, the discussion of the action of the other House, which I do not propose to discuss and which I have no right to discuss. But this bill was dragged out by the action of your great Democratic leader and was never brought to life until it was forced into life by the action of your great commoner, and the manner in which it has been formed, the rates which have been established, and the principle which is involved in the bill lead me to believe that nobody ever anticipated that the bill would pass or that the President of the United States would sign the bill. If it had been thought otherwise it would have been formed on a different basis, with different rates and schedules.

Mr. BACON. I will say, in response to the statement that the bill has been dragged out, that I think that is utterly unwarranted. It would have come out in due course. The only criticism is that it has not been given precedence, and everybody understands that and I am not going into it. I am speaking of what we have here.

Now, Mr. President, we have a bill—I say we have a bill; of course there are several propositions before us, but the bill which the Democrats are advocating, the steel bill which came from the House of Representatives, is one which would give great relief to the people in lessening the burden of taxation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for just a moment and then I will yield to him.

Not only that, but a distinguished Senator, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], with whom the Senator from Idaho is regarded at least as in near affiliation, if not in perfect affiliation, has himself attacked the present law and has himself indicated his purpose to offer certain amendments which, while they do not meet our views, do not go as far as we think they should go, present a proposition to change the law in such manner as to give us a law infinitely better than the one now on the statute books, and which this side would accept in case we can not get our own.

Mr. President, how is Congress to legislate? Is it to be accused of insincerity when it proceeds in the employment of every device known to legislation to try to enact a law? Are Democratic Senators and Representatives to be accused of insincerity because, forsooth, they may have grave reason to apprehend that even if they should do their duty some one else may thwart their purpose?

I would not have said anything in reply to the Senator, but the Senator attacked the sincerity of this side of the Chamber, and I repel it, and say it is absolutely without warrant, and the Senator can not name utterance or put his hand on any fact which would justify such a statement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not attack the other side of the Chamber any more than I did this.

Mr. BACON. Well, I——

Mr. BORAH. And I repeat it is as clear to me as the noonday sun that the leaders in this Chamber, upon either side of the Chamber, never expected that any of the bills that they would pass at this session would become a law.

Mr. BACON. It will not be our fault if they do not become law.

Mr. BORAH. It is an easy thing to say——

Mr. BACON. It is not a cheap thing to say. It is the truth to say.

Mr. BORAH. Let me say just a word in justification of the position which I have taken, because I have not taken it impulsively, nor without a good deal of reflection, because I have watched this program for the last six months.

We came here last fall when the whole country was engaged in a discussion of the result of the decision in the Standard Oil case and the Tobacco case. It was believed that by reason of those decisions it had become incumbent upon Congress to enact some rule or some law providing for the manner of regulating and controlling of the great combines in full control of the American market place, some law which would free it of that form of combination which now makes it impossible for anyone except those in control to fix the price of our products. The whole country was engaged in the discussion, the newspapers in their editorials, men all over the country were writing and discussing this question through papers and magazines, and the thought of the American people had drifted to the question of the control of these few combinations, who, regardless of what we might do with reference to the tariff, had control of the market and still control the prices.

Within 30 days after we had met here, instead of taking hold of that question and dealing with it in a drastic way, so as to relieve the American people, so in case a tariff should be enacted the people would get the benefit, we drifted speedily to the proposition of discussing the tariff, when it was thoroughly understood that the other side of the Chamber and this side of the Chamber and the other House and this House would never in all probability be able to agree upon a tariff bill at this session.

Instead of taking up the proposition which had to do with relieving the burdens of the American people, instead of lifting from their backs that which is now fastened there by extortion and fraud, we took up the proposition wherein we knew we could not accomplish anything at this session. We knew this was purely a political question and both parties would simply be sparring for advantage in the campaign. I do not need to name individuals to prove a matter known of all men.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Idaho says we proceeded with knowledge of the fact that we could not pass a tariff bill, and yet we did pass two or three tariff bills at the last session. I repeat, in order that it may have the attention of the Senator from Idaho, that the Senator, referring to the former session as well as to this, said that it was understood from the beginning that there could be no tariff bills upon which the two Houses could agree, and yet it is a fact that three or four tariff bills dealing with the most important subjects of customs regulations and the tariff did pass both Houses.

Mr. BORAH. At this session?

Mr. BACON, In this Congress. The Senator alluded to what occurred when we met here last year and the Senator said——

Mr. BORAH. I said last fall.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BORAH. I said last fall.

Mr. BACON. In what way does the Senator differentiate? We proceeded when we met in the extra session immediately in the effort to enact tariff legislation, and the two Houses did agree on tariff legislation, and the two Houses did send tariff bills to the Executive which were vetoed.

Now, we are engaged in exactly the same process, and when the Senator says that it was manifest that the two Houses would not agree upon legislation the Senator is not speaking correctly. The Senator will find that the two Houses will agree on legislation—at this time—not only the extra session, but at this time—and the Senator will find that the tariff bills which have come from the House will be passed by the Senate in one shape or another. We will either pass them in the shape we prefer or, if we can not get them in the shape we prefer, we will take the next best we can get; one or the other will pass the Senate at this session.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator expect it to become a law?

Mr. BACON. That is another question. It is a different question altogether.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what I have stated.

Mr. BACON. It goes further than that. We can not say what the Executive will do. It is not within our province to say what he will do. It is our province to do our duty and to leave to others the performance of theirs as they may see fit.

Now, Mr. President, according to what the Senator says, what is to be the attitude of this country at any time when, in the election of the popular branch, it may see fit in the enactment of legislation to repudiate the views of the executive branch? Is it to be said that when a condition of that kind occurs—and that was evidently believed by the framers of the Constitution to be what might occur, because they provided there should be an election of the popular branch in the midst of the term of the Executive—is the position to be taken because there is a Democratic President in the Executive chair and a Republican House, the Republican House must sit supinely and not attempt to put into legislation its policy because it believes a Democratic President, if in the chair, would veto such measures?

Reversing it, if there is a Republican President in the Executive Office and the people elect in the popular branch in the midst of his term a House of Representatives of different politics, of different views on great economic questions, is it to be said that the House is to be charged with insincerity if it proceeds to enact legislation in accordance with the will of the people because, forsooth, there may be a defeat of their purpose by the interposition of a veto by a Republican President? Yet that is the argument of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Not at all.

Mr. BACON. Now, the Senator talks about what the purpose was when we came here, to free the country from the domination of the controlling trusts and interests of that kind. In reply I want to say two things. In the first place, I do not know of any measure that the distinguished and honorable Senator from Idaho has introduced into the Senate on that subject where we have refused to follow him. That is one sufficient reply. The Senator has not been inactive. Will the Senator say he has offered any legislation for the correction of the tremendous evil which he said was the dominant one when Congress assembled?

Then again, Mr. President, I say to the Senator, and not only to him but to those with whom he is affiliated, either in actual or near political relationship, that whenever the prohibitive feature of the protective tariff is relieved so that the people of the United States may be free to make their purchases wherever they see it to be to their interest they will find very much less opportunity for this domination by the trusts, of which the Senator speaks as the great and important duty of Congress to relieve the people of. Whenever you are going to do that, and we all desire that that shall be done, the first thing to be done is to take away from them the opportunity which the high protective tariff gives to barricade themselves against competition from without.

Mr. President, we hear much about trusts. What is the objection to a trust except that it is a monopoly? What is the great evil in trusts except that they monopolize the market? Yet the fundamental principle of the party with which the Senator is affiliated, and I repeat either in actual or near relationship, has as a fundamental principle the restraint of competition.

It is a curious thing that the Senator from Utah, I think it was, said the other day, not in words, but by necessary implication—no; it was the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]—that monopoly which entirely destroys competition is considered to be infamous, but monopoly which only partially destroys it is considered by the Republican Party to be highly commendatory.

Mr. President, this discussion grew out of the statement by the Senator that the Democrats in the Senate did not desire the passage of this metal bill, and the Senator from Utah echoed it, sotto voce, saying that Senators on this side of the Chamber were gratified at the prospect that it would not become a law. I say, Mr. President, that statement is utterly unwarranted, that I utterly repel it, and I challenge Senators to put their fingers upon a single act or indicate a single word from this side of the Chamber which would justify any such imputation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. It is true that I echoed the statement made by the Senator from Idaho, and I did it for this reason. I am not going to mention Senators by name——

Mr. BACON. I think in an imputation of that kind the Senator ought to mention them by name.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to do that, but I am going to say that I have discussed the rates in this bill with some of the Senators who admit that they were not right. They say, What is the use of changing them, because it never will become a law. That is an indication, I take it, that they never expect the bill to become a law.

Mr. BACON. Now, the Senator in making that statement is trying to produce the impression that it is a statement which reflects the sentiment and views of the Senators on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not so stated, nor do I know what are the views of the majority on the other side.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Nor did I say so in the statement I made.

Mr. BACON. Nor does the Senator venture to say that that reflects the views of any considerable number on this side. Yet the Senator from Utah, when the Senator from Idaho made the general statement to that effect, not speaking of individuals, the Senator from Utah standing in his place, gave it his assent, when he himself says now that he does not know it to be true, that he was speaking about what only one or two said to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know how general the statement made by the Senator from Idaho was, but——

Mr. BACON. Let me say to the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the Senator will read the RECORD he will see that the statement I made was in a very few words—that it would please some if the bill was vetoed by the President.

Mr. BACON. To do what?

Mr. SMOOT. If the President vetoed the bill.

Mr. BACON. What about it?

Mr. SMOOT. If the President vetoed it.

Mr. BACON. Who would be pleased?

Mr. SMOOT. Some Senators.

Mr. BACON. The Senator did not say that. I do not believe the Senator can find a Senator on this side who would be pleased if the President vetoed it.

It is very easy, Mr. President, for the Senator to say a thing of that kind and then shelter himself behind the assertion that he will not make the mention of somebody on this side of the Chamber. I care not who the Senator on this side of the Chamber is, I challenge the Senator from Utah to name him.

Mr. SMOOT. I have said exactly what I intended to say, and that is enough to——

Mr. BACON. The Senator, then, will excuse me for saying that unless he will give the names he must excuse me for not having confidence in the correctness of his statement.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the Senator having confidence in the statement, I want to say I have said nothing but the truth in the matter, and so let it rest there.

Mr. BACON. I shall not let it rest there.

That is not all, Mr. President. The Senator from Utah, when called upon for specifications, mentioned the fact that when he pointed out certain items in the bill some Senators on this side said that they did not believe that particular item was correct. But the Senator does not say that from that he drew the inference they would like to have the bill vetoed. I challenge the Senator to stand in his place now and say that any Democratic Senator has ever said to him that he desired this bill to be vetoed. If he says yes, I intend to find out who the Senator was before I am through.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator asked if the Senator from Idaho has introduced any bills regulating these combinations; the Senator from Idaho replies that such bills have been before the committees for months.

Mr. SMOOT. I have never made that statement, and I do not make it now.

Mr. BACON. The Senator's statement implied that. I repeat if the Senator will stand in his place and say that any Senator on this side of the Chamber has made any such statement, I will find who that Senator is and give his name to the Senate; and until that is done I decline to give credence to his statement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia insists on doing two things wholly unnecessary in this debate or for the elucidation of my proposition; first, drawing a criticism, which might have been implied in the remarks I made exclusively to the Democratic side. I made no remark which should be so construed, and I would not be justified in making any such remark. I intend any criticism I am making, if you choose to call it a criticism, to apply to both sides—to the situation as it exists.

On the other hand, the Senator makes the mistake, it seems to me, of desiring one to put his finger upon the particular power which moves the machinery of this Senate.

Mr. BACON. No; I did not.

Mr. BORAH. I have been here for three or four years, and I have watched these things move. I do not say they do not move simply because I do not see and understand always what makes them move.

I have been here long enough to know that they are moving by reason of the fact that there is an understanding somewhere which, unfortunately, I can not always locate and reduce to writing. That situation has existed here long enough for the Senator from Georgia to be familiar with it, and I think he is. I would be surprised if at times, owing to his prestige and influence, he is not a part of the moving power.

But the statement which I made remains true to my mind, and that is that there was either by accident or design—I think by design—the taking up of a subject for legislation at this session upon which the two parties are unalterably divided and wherein it would be impossible, as was understood by everyone who understood legislation here, that final results could be accomplished at this session.

Does the Senator pretend to say that many in the Senate Chamber assume that this legislation with reference to the tariff can result in a law at this session? If he does not, then he admits everything that I have stated——

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. BORAH. And that is that we have been spending some six months' time here doing that which must result fruitlessly, when there was a nonpartisan subject which ought to have been taken up and could have been successfully dealt with had we set about it.

Mr. President, I voiced this same sentiment the other day when my friend from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was upon the floor, and I have voiced it repeatedly, not only here, but elsewhere, and privately to my colleagues, that this proposition of nibbling at the tariff until we make it possible for competition to exist in this country, by either destroying or regulating these combinations, is mere trifling with the interest of the American public. You can not regulate the trusts from the custom-house, and until you do deal with them, mere changes in duties will not help the consumer. I do not hesitate to repeat here, regardless of whom it may hit or hurt, that until the American Senate takes hold of this question, large as it is and important as it is, and bends its energies and its efforts to the successful solution of it, you can change a little upon the duty on hides or on iron or steel, but it will never reach the man in the street. No change which we effected in the tariff law at the previous session, no change which you will effect in this law, if you have your own way, will ever reach the man who is already overburdened.

The men who are controlling the market place, who fix the price of what we eat and what we wear, will fix it regardless of this play of politics here in the Senate of the United States on the tariff. They will fix it regardless of who is elected President of the United States, unless we elect some one with the courage and the statesmanship to take hold of this great question of the century, and that is whether the combinations will control us or we will control the combinations.

You told us when we were passing the Payne-Aldrich bill that if we would take the duty off hides we would have cheaper shoes. We took the duty off hides, hides went down, shoes went up, and two and a quarter million dollars of revenue went into somebody's pocket—that somebody whom we refuse or hesitate to attack because of their power. You said if we would take the duty off lumber the American home builder would get the benefit of cheaper lumber. A million and a quarter dollars of revenue from lumber went into the hands of the foreign dealer, and the American home builder never received one cent of benefit from it.

Now, what I say is this, and I do not hesitate to repeat it as often as I may have an opportunity, that we are shirking the responsibility which rests upon us when we undertake to make the American people believe that by dealing with the tariff we can bring relief to them when there stands imperious and unchallenged the power in the market place to fix any price they see fit to fix with reference to any article that comes under control. You may go to the free-trade countries, you may go to the protection countries, and these combines are extorting their millions while legislators shrink from taking hold of them. But the time is fast approaching when we will be compelled to act or, if we do not do so, others will be found to take our places.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will try to take up the Senator's argument where he left it off. What means it when we see this great struggle in Congress on the question whether the tariff shall be high or shall be low? Why is it that those who are engaged in the industries to be affected by a change in the tariff are insistent upon a high tariff?

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me; I heard the Senator through and I did not interrupt him. I hope the Senator will let me proceed.

Why is it? Simply because the effect of the tariff is to make high prices upon the articles where a high duty is imposed upon the importation of corresponding articles from a foreign country.

Now, why do they oppose the opportunity for the purchase of similiar articles from foreign countries? Simply because the importation of similar articles from foreign countries gives the opportunity for competition, and that competition necessarily results in the destruction of monopoly and in the lowering of prices.

Therefore, Mr. President, when the Senator stands here and says that the great imperative duty, that which is most imperative, is to relieve the people of those who are now in the enjoyment of these monopolistic advantages and opportunities, he frames the strongest argument which can be framed against the existence of laws which gives them the opportunity to do that which would be taken away from them if the tariff were reduced.

Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Idaho is that the taking off the tariff from various articles does not relieve the people from high prices. If that were true, you would not find the Senator from Utah and those who are in affiliation with him and in sympathy with him insistent upon a high tariff. You would not find them insisting upon that if it was a matter of unimportance. It is true that occasionally, for certain reasons which may not operate directly in the manner in which they would do under ordinary circumstances, the taking off a tariff does not lower prices; but everybody knows, and none better than those who favor the high tariff, that the retention of the high tariff is the way in which to maintain high prices for those who manufacture articles similar to those upon the importation of which the tariff is imposed.

If the argument of the Senator from Utah is correct there is no necessity at this or any other time to reduce the tariff so far as the people are concerned.

So far as the burden resting upon the people is concerned, according to that argument it is just the same whether the tariff remains or whether it is taken off, yet we find those who are mainly interested in the maintenance of those prices insisting upon the policy which would retain this exorbitant tariff.

Now, Mr. President, I come back for a moment to the proposition, which the Senator and I could not very well now thrash out in all the details of the discussion, as to the influence of particular schedules upon prices in particular cases. There is the question as to whether or not the price of shoes is mainly influenced by the price of hides or whether it is mainly influenced by the fact that those who manufacture shoes have patents upon machines by which they are manufactured and get the monopoly in another way, and a great many other things which could be suggested in reply to the suggestions of the Senator as to certain articles which have not gone down in price, although the tariff has been lowered in regard thereto. That is too wide a field for present discussion.

But the main general proposition that the high tariff makes high prices lies at the very foundation of the Republican advocacy of a high tariff, and they even go to the extent that it not only makes a high price of a particular article, but makes the high price of everything else, even of raw cotton, upon which there is no duty. As the Senator from Utah contended on yesterday, even in the production of raw cotton, upon which there is no duty, the effect of the tariff was so great that the growers of cotton had their full benefit and an equal benefit in raising the price with the producers of the protected articles by reason of the tariff. If that were so, Mr. President, it is not necessary to have a tariff upon any particular article; you can, according to that argument, confer a benefit upon the producers of that particular article by taxing them in making them pay higher prices for other articles which they consume. That is the argument of the Senator.

But, Mr. President, I come back to this question——

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Georgia stated that the Senator from Idaho stated with reference to the duty——

Mr. BACON. I meant to say Utah. The Senator will pardon me. The Senator from Utah was the Senator who made that argument. I am not surprised that the Senator from Idaho was unwilling that it should be attributed to him. I think the Senator from Utah is about the only one who would stand for it.

But, Mr. President, coming back to this general proposition, is it true when a President of one party is in power, and while he is in power a House of Representatives is elected of a contrary party, it is the duty of that House of Representatives to ignore the economic questions upon which it was elected, that it shall ignore the command of the people that they shall legislate in regard to those particular economic questions? And is it true that by reason of the apprehension that a Republican President will veto their legislation they are not only to sit quiet and do nothing, but if they attempt to do anything they shall be charged with playing politics and with being insincere?

Mr. President, it is a tremendous question, this question of high tariff or low tariff. It is a question which involves untold millions to the people of the United States. It is a question which involves every man, I care not how low he may be in the scale not only socially, but in a business way, the commonest laborer who wears clothes and who does not go barefoot, or who uses a pocketknife or wears a hat or sleeps under a blanket, each and every one of them is interested in this great question; and it is the duty of Congress when it shall be in power to do its part toward relieving the people of such grievous burdens. How does the Senator say that he knows there will be none of these tariff measures approved by the President?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho did not say that he knew.

Mr. BACON. I will take the Senator's answer a little later on, and I will not object to his giving it.

The President vetoed the bills that were passed at the extra session, not upon the ground that they were improper in their rates, but mainly upon the ground that the Tariff Board had not reported. Now, the Tariff Board has reported upon some of these schedules.

Mr. SMOOT. On two of them.

Mr. BACON. On two of them—cotton and wool. We have a woolen schedule and we will have a cotton schedule from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator states that we have a report on the woolen schedule. I ask him whether the Democratic House of Representatives took any notice of that report?

Mr. BACON. I am not talking about the House; I am talking about the President of the United States now.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was talking about the bill itself as being based upon the Tariff Board's report, and I wished to call attention to the fact that the Democratic House paid no attention to it.

Mr. BACON. That is not the question. As is suggested to me by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] if the woolen bill which comes over from the House is not in accord or in harmony with the Tariff Board, the majority who sit on that side of the Chamber can offer an amendment and make it in accord with the report of the Tariff Board, and if we can not pass our bill we will take theirs.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to ask the Senator if a bill is framed by the majority of the Senators, and framed according to the Tariff Board's report, will the Senator vote for it?

Mr. BACON. I will say this to the Senator without hesitation: We, of course, will support our own bill, but if we can not carry through the bill that we favor and the Senator's party frames another bill which prescribes duties less than the rates of duty in the present law, we will vote for it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has not changed his position. That is what he did at the last session of Congress, and said openly on the floor of the Senate that is what he would do.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That was before any Tariff Board reported.

Mr. BACON. Now we have the Tariff Board's report, and the Senator from Idaho said that our work necessarily and obviously would have no result; that our own action in regard thereto could not be taken as serious or with any purpose or expectation to accomplish anything.

I am replying to that when I say that non constat the President of the United States will not sign a bill which may be passed by this Congress. In the first place, so far as the woolen bill is concerned, the House of Representatives has acted upon its own responsibility and has passed a bill such as was proper to pass; and the Democratic Members of the Senate approve of that bill and are in favor of its passage. If it is passed, we do not know what view the President of the United States may take of it, in view of the fact that the Tariff Board has acted. But if we can not pass the House bill, the Senators sitting on that side of the Chamber have it in their power to present another bill to the Senate, which, it is presumed, the President will approve; and if it lessens the cost to the consumer, and to the great mass of the consumers of this country, all of whom use wool in greater or less degree, we will vote for your bill, although it is not such a bill as we would desire. And the same is true of the steel bill. It will not be our fault if such bills are not passed at this session.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will remind the Senator from Georgia of the fact also that the President of the United States, in transmitting the Tariff Board report to Congress, has stated in rather strong language that the present tariff on wool is inexcusable.

Mr. BACON. Yes; and such utterances are innumerable all through the country, emanating not only from Democrats but from Republicans. We have not any guaranty that the veto of the last bill is meeting with the approval of the people of the United States.

But, Mr. President, here is the main question: The question raised by the Senator from Idaho is whether a Democratic House of Representatives and their Democratic colleagues in the Senate, although in the minority here, are to be charged with insincerity, are they to be charged with trifling, are they to be charged with no purpose except to make or play politics, when they proceed in good faith to make laws in accordance with the will of the people as expressed at the polls, because, forsooth, of the apprehension, or even the strong belief, if you please—nobody can have a certainty—that it may not be enacted into law by reason of the opposition of the Executive?

I want to say this to Senators: So far as the Democrats of the Senate are concerned and so far as the Democrats of the House are concerned, we propose to do our part in the enactment of this tariff legislation. We propose to do it in the way that we approve if we can accomplish it. If we can not accomplish it in the degree that we approve, we propose then to join with you in anything which lowers the burden of tariff taxation at the present time. I wish to let the Senate know and to let the public know that we are not only sincere in the bills which we propose to enact into law, but we are still further sincere in the effort to relieve the people of this great burden of tariff taxation by saying that we will take your bill whenever you produce it if we can not pass ours, provided it lessens that burden.

Mr. BORAH. And neither of them will help the consumer a particle.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Idaho suggests a new school of politics—a new school of economics.

Mr. BORAH. It is not so very new. It has been heard from during the last few months.

Mr. BACON. I presume that is the reason why in the last 11 years when both the executive and legislative branches of the Government have been Republican they have endeavored in every way to maintain the high protective tariff. It was because in so doing it was understood that they were helping the consumer. That is the only excuse that could be given for it. To help the consumer was the motive.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming rose.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me? If so, I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I simply wanted to ask a question.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wanted to ask the Senator if he was in favor of and would vote for the House bills on sugar, wool, and steel?

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that I am not prepared to answer on the sugar question, because the bill on that subject has not yet been reported, or if it has been, I have not had the opportunity to examine it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course I was referring to the House bill, which has been reported and has been passed by that body.

Mr. BACON. I am talking about the House bills. I will answer without hesitation as to the steel bill or the metal bill and the woolen bill; yes, absolutely, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." Whether I agree with all the details or not is not material. We can not expect hundreds of men to agree on all details, but only a general agreement as to general purposes can be expected.

So far as sugar is concerned—I am not endeavoring to evade that—I am very frank to say I have not yet made up my mind as to what is the best course to pursue in regard to that subject; but whatever the course is, there is one thing in regard to it about which I am entirely satisfied in my own mind, and that is that there ought to be a reduction and a very material one, and I have no doubt, when the time comes to give that matter careful consideration, I shall have as definite a view in regard to it as I have in regard to the metal bill or the woolen bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia further yield?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator if he believes in the proposition that we ought to buy where we can buy the cheapest?

Mr. BACON. Well, the Senator is starting out now upon a very wide field of discussion, one that involves the whole question which is embraced in the protective-tariff doctrine, and if the Senator will wait until I get through——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope the Senator will elucidate it.

Mr. BACON. I have not yet finished. I say to the Senator that I recognize as a fundamental proposition that, outside of the needs of government and such influence upon prices as the supplying of those needs may require, it is the right of a man to buy where he can buy the cheapest.

Mr. President, that involves going into the whole protective-tariff system. I utterly disagree with it, and I do not think that anyone can defend it who does not go the full length and say that it ought to be prohibitive of all importations. Whenever you make it a question of degree of prohibition, you have given up the argument. That, of course, I can not go into now; but the Senator from Wyoming does not in the least embarrass me when he asks me that question. I do not recognize the right of the Government to make any man pay one dollar more for what he needs to purchase than is required in order that the governmental purposes may be subserved. The Government, sir, has a right to require of me everything that I possess and that it needs. It has a right to take my time; it has a right to take my services; it has a right to take my property; it has a right to take my life for the Government's own needs; but the Government has not the right to take one dime from my pocket to give to the Senator from Wyoming. That is the doctrine on which I stand; and if that does not answer the Senator's question plainly, I will try to add to it, if he so desires.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 656.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator yield to me just for a minute before he takes that matter up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business has not yet been disposed of.

Mr. HEYBURN. What I propose will not provoke any debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a bill now pending before the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought the unfinished business had been laid aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the unfinished business is still before the Senate. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator. I thought the Senator merely rose to ask that the unfinished business be laid aside.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when this bill came to the Senate from the other House proposing to reduce duties upon imports and was referred to the Committee on Finance, that committee took up the metal schedule in a way that indicated that it was in earnest about it, in a way that indicated that the members of that committee, representing the majority as well as the minority, expected that something would be done with reference to that schedule. It was announced that there would be hearings and that everybody who desired to be heard with reference to the metal schedule would be given an opportunity to come before the committee and to state his views about this proposed legislation. For nearly a month the committee sat day after day, beginning at 10 o'clock and sometimes, I believe, a part of the time sat until 1 o'clock. There appeared before the committee I should say, speaking generally, several hundred representatives of the manufacturing industries affected by this legislation; they seemed to be in earnest; they seemed to think that we were engaged in a serious business; they were interrogated by Members representing both political parties as if we were engaged in a serious business and as if it was expected that some legislation of some kind or character would be had during this session with reference to the duties upon the products of iron and steel and the manufactures thereof.

When that bill was reported to the Senate we entered upon a discussion of it. There have been, I believe, but two speeches made up to this time upon this side of the Chamber. On the other side of the Chamber we have been notified that it is the purpose of leading members of the Committee on Finance to discuss this question elaborately. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] devoted, I think, nearly three days to a discussion of the question. He had the serious attention of the entire Senate. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has now spoken, I believe this is the fourth day, upon that subject. I regret to say, Mr. President, that during the last two days the Senator from Utah has had but very little attention; a part of the time he has spoken to two or three Senators upon the other side and to two or three Senators upon this side. For some reason—I do not know what—a lack of interest in this matter upon the part of the other side of the Chamber has developed, and now we are told by a Senator on the other side of the Chamber that this is not a serious business at all and that there is to be no legislation upon this subject at this session of Congress.

If that be so, Mr. President, something has happened. The interest that existed at one time in this schedule has disappeared. Senators upon the other side have probably learned that the Executive has made up his mind to veto any legislation that may be passed at this session of the Senate affecting this schedule or any other schedule. If that be so, if the Senator from Idaho is correct in his statement about this matter, if there is to be no legislation, if it is fixed, if it is settled that the Executive is going to veto it, if all interest on this measure as a result of that has disappeared on the other side of the Chamber, then, Mr. President, it seems to me that we have reached a condition here when we might take a vote.

I desire now, in view of the statement by the Senator from Idaho and in view of the lack of interest on the other side of the Chamber in this matter, which the Senator from Idaho says is the result of the fact that it is known that there will be no legislation at this term, I now ask unanimous consent that we fix a day to vote upon this bill and all amendments. I suggest to Senators on the other side that, in view of this situation, the vote might be taken speedily, and I suggest to-day a week as the time for taking that vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not hear the last suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. In view of the situation that has been developed here, and in view of the statement of the Senator from Idaho, I suggest that we come to a unanimous-consent agreement that at an early date next week, say next Wednesday, we take a vote upon this bill and all amendments that may be offered to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, responding to the suggestion of the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, if there are any other Senators who desire to speak—and I understand that probably two other Senators on the other side do desire to do so—that will afford abundant time for them to deliver their speeches.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the request for an agreement is submitted to the Senate, I desire to say that there is at least one Senator upon this side of the Chamber who takes the matter rather seriously. I was not able to hear the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] this afternoon, because I had an imperative engagement for a little while elsewhere. I listened to him with a very great deal of interest and a great deal of attention during the greater part of the three former days of his speech, and it was because the Senator from Utah had said that he preferred to get on with his speech and not suffer interruptions that I permitted myself to be absent for any time to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me one suggestion——

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say when I sit here and listen to an array of figures, which I desire very much to question and feel that I can not interrupt, the temptation becomes so great occasionally that I am compelled to flee the Chamber lest I should yield to the temptation. The Senator from Utah, however, has made, from his standpoint, an illuminating and instructive speech. In my observations I confined myself to certain basic material of the manufacturers of iron and steel. I intend before this debate is finished, whether there is one Senator here or a hundred Senators here—if there could be that many—to give some attention to certain other items in the metal schedule in response to the argument that has just been made by the Senator from Utah.

I can not think that the Senator from North Carolina has correctly interpreted the attitude of Senators upon this side of the Chamber. Whether they are for a reduction or whether they are against a reduction, they must all consider that it is a serious question at least, and we must all vote upon the question in some form or other.

I do not rise to object to fixing a time for voting upon this schedule, but I do rise for the purpose of advising the Senate that before the debate is closed I intend to say something more with regard to certain of the items of this schedule; but if Senators will indicate how many of them expect to speak, we can very easily arrange for a time, I am sure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me just a moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Iowa was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Idaho made his statement. The Senator from Idaho accounted for the lack of interest in the able speech of the Senator from Utah—and it was a very able presentation of the subject from his standpoint—by the statement that this side of the Chamber was not sincere in desiring this legislation——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. And that not only this side, but the other side of the Chamber knew that there was to be no effective legislation at this session——

Mr. BORAH. What the Senator from Idaho said——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment, if the Senator please—that there was to be no effective legislation at this time, and because it was known that this legislation was to fail, either in this Chamber or at the other end of the Avenue, there was no interest being taken in it. I have suggested that if that be true, if that is the situation, and the Senator from Idaho has correctly interpreted it; if there is to be a veto, and that is already settled, and because that is settled there is no interest here and there will be no interest hereafter, then why not let us have a vote? So far as the sincerity of this side of the Chamber is concerned, if we are permitted to vote we will testify by our acts, rather than our words, our sincerity.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator has finished——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do if I have the floor.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho said that, in his judgment, the reason there was so little attention being given to the discussion of this matter was because no one expected that any bill we were discussing would become a law at this session. I do not care to have any other interpretation put upon my statement; but spoken as it was spoken, the Senator from Idaho has no occasion in the world to modify it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wished the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who was absent when that statement was made, to be put in possession of the basis of the request which I have made.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President, that the Senator from Idaho had some reason for his statement. Unfortunately, there is a feeling in the Senate, for which I think certain members of the Finance Committee are responsible, that no schedule should be revised until it has received the investigation of the Tariff Board. I did my best to remove that feeling from the minds of Senators the other day. I do not know whether or not I had any success at all; but if we could drive out of this Chamber the conclusion that has been reached by certain Senators on this side that there ought to be no revision of a schedule until the Tariff Board has reported upon it, then I am sure that a larger number of Senators would listen to what is to be said upon the subject, in order to receive the information which they ought to have before they vote.

If the Senator from Utah—I look upon him as the leader upon this subject, at least—would publicly indicate that he believes that the Senate ought to take up the metal schedule and vote upon it according to the evidence accessible to all of us, and without regard to the report of the Tariff Board, which may come in a year and which may never come, I believe that interest would be instantly aroused. I therefore suggest to the Senator from Utah that he indicate what his views are upon that matter. Ought we to go on with the evidence that he has and that he has put before the Senate and the evidence that I have attempted to put before the Senate, and change those duties in accordance with the views of the Members of the Senate upon the strength of the evidence, or should we simply defer all action, no matter what information we have, until at some uncertain time in the future we may have the report of the Tariff Board? I believe that is responsible for the lack of interest or the lack of disposition upon the part of certain Senators to listen to the arguments.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah, inasmuch as I made a request of him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the Senator from Iowa when he says this is a very serious question. It has been a serious question to me; and it is for that reason that I have given it the study I have. As I have already said, there are 25,000 institutions in this country and a million and a half employees affected by this measure. If we had the information to make a revision of this schedule that I think we should have, I would gladly cooperate with the Senator from Iowa to make that revision. I say personally——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator please speak a little louder? We can not hear him on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I say personally—not as a member of the Finance Committee—that it is because of the interest I have had in this schedule that I think we should have the fullest information possible. For the first two days of my speech I hardly touched a paragraph of this schedule. The time was given over to debate, and it was not because I objected to interruptions that after that I asked not be interrupted. For two days I objected to no interruption, and I cared not whether there were speeches made in my time or not; but I felt exactly as the Senator from North Carolina felt—I wanted to get through; I wanted a vote upon the bill. I do not think there is any intention on the part of any Senator on this side of the Chamber to defer voting upon these tariff bills. I believe if the Senator will keep this bill before the Senate the speaking will be over at least by, and perhaps before, next Wednesday. I can not say that it will be, and I do not now want to agree to a vote upon that day, because the discussion has virtually just begun; but I do say to the Senator that I hope we will get a vote upon this bill and upon every other tariff bill that is before the Senate at the very earliest day possible.

I wish, further, to say to the Senator that I am one of those who would like to get away from here by the middle of June, but I do not know whether or not that can be done. We can not prevent any Senator discussing any question so long as he may please; but I know I can say to the Senator that there is no desire whatever upon the part of any Republican Member of this body to inaugurate a filibuster or to try to delay the consideration of the tariff bills.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not through. I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Iowa before taking my seat, if he does not object.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me, I simply want to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. That was the purpose of my interruption. I know of only two Senators on this side who desire to speak on this bill, and I have heard of but three on the other side who desire to speak.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina is not heard upon this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that I knew of but two Senators on this side of the Chamber who desire to speak, and I have heard of but three or four on the other side of the Chamber who desire to be heard. If Wednesday next is too early, if it is thought that the five or six Senators who still desire to speak can not finish in that time, I suggest that we vote on Friday of next week. That will give us seven full legislative days.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not believe it will hasten matters any at this time to agree upon a day to vote. The Senator knows exactly what an agreement means. It would only provide for a vote upon the legislative day; everything else perhaps would be put aside; and then at that time we would consume the whole legislative day, as well as days to follow as the legislative day. It would only be postponing the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that a bad practice.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is a bad thing to do, and I believe the Senate will sooner arrive at a vote without an agreement than they would if a time were fixed.

Mr. President, I have not heard the Senator from Idaho, nor have I heard any other Senator, intimate that President Taft would veto any tariff bills, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. No such intimation has been made here by any Senator, and I do not believe there is any Senator here who knows what action the President will take. I am sure that the Senator from Idaho did not make such an assertion, or even suggest it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Idaho stated that it was generally understood that there would be no tariff legislation; and I stated that I believed there could be some legislation on the part of the Senate and the House, and that if there was to be a failure of legislation, the apprehension of which he indicated as the reason for the lack of interest in the debate, it would have to be by a veto at the other end of the Avenue. I think everybody recognizes that to be the situation. I do not think there is anybody who doubts that a bill of some kind or character revising the steel schedule will be passed by the Senate and will likely be concurred in by the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Iowa, I desire to say that I do not believe at this time, from the information we have at our command, the steel schedule can be revised as it should be revised. That is how I feel. I think I have given as much study to this bill and to each individual paragraph of it as almost any Senator, but for the life of me I can not say what the rates ought to be. If, however, the Tariff Board will make an investigation upon this subject not only in this country, but in foreign countries as well, I believe we could get together with such a report, revise the metal schedule, and revise it so that it will stay revised for at least a few years, and let the unsettled condition and unrest now prevalent in the country because of the agitation about tariff legislation cease for a while, and give business a chance to get in a settled condition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment, and then I will yield. The Senator from Utah has spent four days in demonstrating what the duties ought to be. He has shown us what, according to his view, the duties ought to be upon most of the items in the metal schedule; and, as I remarked to him the other day, I think if his proof is accepted instead of reducing the duties in the metal schedule we ought to multiply them by three or four in order to have a protective tariff. Therefore it is simply a question of weighing the evidence. I know the Senator from Utah is wholly sincere; but what I would like him to do would be to use his influence to lead this side of the Senate in the direction of taking the evidence and doing whatever good conscience and good judgment require us to do with it, and not to take the position that we ought to defer any revision of the schedule until some other body shall act upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not suggested in all that I have said in the Senate that a single rate be advanced or increased.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I said you——

Mr. SMOOT. Another thing. The reason I say it would be unwise to undertake this revision is this: As I look back on the three years past I find that the importations of many items have increased, and I think when importations have increased as they have under the present rate it is an indication, at least, that the rate is about what it should be; that if it was lowered very much—I do not say any, but lowered very much—we would then be reaching the danger point.

We have no testimony upon the bulk of this schedule that would in any way indicate to us whether there should be a lowering of rates or not. We have a report upon pig iron and steel rails and some of the basic articles by Herbert Knox Smith, but we have no report made by anybody upon the highly manufactured article coming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not willing to admit that the Members of the Senate have not had an opportunity and have not studied this schedule.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have never charged that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know the Senator from Iowa has not, but others perhaps have.

I believe that the Senate is as well prepared this afternoon to vote on this schedule as it would be on Wednesday afternoon next, because I believe that every Member of the Senate has gone into this schedule sufficiently to form his own opinion upon the subject.

If the Senator from North Carolina will allow me, I will change his request for unanimous consent, and I will ask unanimous consent that on Monday next at 4 o'clock this schedule and all amendments pending be voted on, and that the bill be disposed of before adjournment on that day.

Mr. SIMMONS. This side of the Chamber will be glad to accept that proposition, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will do better than that. Inasmuch as it has now become a matter of exchange of good will, I suggest that the proposal of the Senator from Wyoming be modified in this way: That to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, we take up this bill and continue its discussion and consideration until it is disposed of, and that no other business shall intervene, and that we shall vote just as soon as the discussion ends, but not later than Monday at 4 o'clock.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa, I withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this side of the Chamber will gladly accept the proposition of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not either spent or wasted much time during this session in talk. I am not going to depart from a rule that I laid down some time ago in that respect. As a member of the Committee on Finance I naturally feel that I have a right to express an opinion, if not to make a so-called speech, but when I sat in the Chamber to-day and had for companions three other Senators when the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was making what I considered a very able speech, it occurred to me that we have reached a point where we should get through the discussion of this bill and vote on it.

While I had thought I would make some observations on the question, I have entirely dismissed that from my mind, and I assure the Senator from Iowa that I cordially join in with him in the proposition he has made. Let us take this bill up, consider it, stop unnecessary talk, and vote on it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope Senators will concur in the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire. I am not willing that an hour shall be fixed on Monday to vote on the bill. I am willing, however, to enter upon its consideration and the moment that consideration closes by reason of failure of discussion, to vote upon the pending proposition, whatever it may be, and to continue to vote until the bill is disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the reason why I suggested to the Senator from North Carolina that I thought he could get a vote sooner by not agreeing to a time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this matter is present. The proposition of the Senator from Iowa amounts simply to changing from 2 o'clock to 12 the hour when the Senate shall take up the unfinished business. If we are to conform to his suggestion it would mean that at 12 o'clock each day, after the prayer and the reading of the Journal, we would take up the schedule for consideration until voted upon. We would have to dispense with some of the rules of the Senate to do that, but it is within the power of the Senate to do it.

Now, I look upon this question too seriously to consider any such proposition. I will not charge any man with or suggest insincerity in any Senator who has made suggestions in regard to the taking of a vote, but it must be apparent to all that the Senate is not ready to vote upon this question.

The fact that Senators are not always present in the Chamber does not indicate that they do not entertain views in regard to the various items in this schedule, nor does the fact that Senators are not at all times present in the Chamber indicate that all Senators have fully expressed themselves in regard to this schedule.

The iron and steel schedule is one of the most important in tariff legislation, in all senses of the word, both as to capital involved and invested, as to the labor employed, as to the effect of the employment or the idleness of laborers on the general prosperity of the country and on the specific prosperity of each individual. I can not think that Senators upon due reflection would consider it wise to vote upon this question, either to-day or at any early period. We have listened to a very thorough and a very able presentation of the question, which amounted to spreading upon the table for consideration the subjects upon which we are to act.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has not, as he says, undertaken to say what rates should be imposed. The Senate has not considered the question as to whether or not we should enact tariff legislation at this time or at any time. We have no command from the country to enter upon the consideration of tariff legislation. We have—and I speak now to the Republican side of this House—no command and no suggestion from the organized Republican Party of this country that there is a necessity to enter upon a revision of the tariff schedules.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield in a moment.

The last time the party spoke was in its last national convention, and it then expressed its views upon the question of tariff legislation, and a Republican Congress has acted upon that expression, and until we again hear from the Republican Party in council assembled I do not feel that we are at liberty, much less under the necessity, of taking up the question for consideration.

I now yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to ask the Senator if in his view his political obligations would not be fulfilled if he agreed to vote on a certain hour on Monday—the hour which, I think, the Senator from Iowa suggested—and he voted "nay."

Mr. HEYBURN. No, Mr. President; I would not feel that the obligation the Republican Party is under would be fulfilled by any such proposition. Until the party to which I belong again commands its representatives in Congress to take up this question, I am opposed to taking it up. That is organized government. That is not sensational——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, the Senator understands, as the Senator from Kansas suggests to me, that the question is up.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, it is not up; it is only sought to be brought up, and the effort on the part of Republicans should be to drive it back whence it came. The question is not up for responsible action.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Idaho think that the duty of the Republicans in the Senate is a continuing one, and that if he is required by his platform to see that the duties are properly adjusted and measure the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, he can fulfill that obligation by passing a single tariff law, if he thereafter becomes convinced that the duty imposed is higher than is necessary to measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad?

Mr. HEYBURN. When you have acted upon definite policies expressed by your party, you are not at liberty to disturb the condition resulting from that action until the party directs you to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not believe we are at liberty here from day to day, because a change in market conditions or a change in the conditions of production or consumption happens to suggest that perhaps we might have enacted a different law when we were making up the tariff—I do not believe we are at liberty to disturb conditions at any interval that may suggest itself to any Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose our party meets in convention, as I suppose it will, next month. It declares for protection, giving the proper definition, as I suppose it will, and adjourns. Then, according to the view taken by the Senator from Idaho, we must wait four years more before further entering upon the inquiry as to whether a schedule or an item needs revision.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not a question of waiting. It is a question of the stability of the law under which the people shall perform their duties and obligations and enjoy the rights of citizenship and prosperity. The tariff should not be revised by the Republican Party so long as the conditions, in the judgment of that party, in council assembled, do not warrant it, and you can not have stability of Government under any other theory than that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I understand that it is inappropriate and improper for us to take up for investigation and examination and revision any schedule of the tariff until a political party in convention commands us to do it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Until the political party to which we owe allegiance tells us that the sentiment of the country, represented by those who compose the national convention, coming from every district in the United States—until they bring forth the views of their districts and say: "Our people or a majority of them belonging to the Republican Party"—not to some other party, but to the Republican Party—"consider that it is now time to take up for consideration again the measures that make for our prosperity"—not until then should we act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is that rule applicable to every subject with which Congress ought to deal?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I am talking of the one great business subject upon which the prosperity of the people rests. The tariff stands alone as the business organization of our country. It represents the profit or loss to the people of the country. I do not mean now the Government, but the people of the country. It is the people, speaking through a national convention, when their voice is ratified at the election following it, that commands us on that great question because it is the overruling governmental question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just one question: Then I assume if in the last two years our experience and knowledge had demonstrated that the duty on steel rails was so low that a foreign country was filling up our market with its product, it would not be within our province to take up the subject and increase the duty.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would not be within the wisdom of political action to take up any schedule separate and apart from the great mass of the schedules that constitute the system of protection.

The Senator introduced at the beginning of the last session of Congress, or of the last Congress, a resolution declaring in favor of the revision of the tariff by schedules. He has never mentioned it since. I remember making some remarks at that time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am just as much in favor of that as I ever was. Of course, by that I did not mean, as the Senator from Idaho well knows, that no more than one schedule could be considered at one session of Congress, but simply that the one schedule was to be considered independently of all other schedules, and that no amendment affecting other schedules could be introduced into the bill for the revision of the schedule under consideration.

I am happy to say that Congress is acting upon that resolution, although it did not adopt it. I am glad to say that my friends on the Finance Committee, or some of them, now believe that that is the way in which the tariff should be revised. I am glad to say the President of the United States is in favor of that way of revising our tariff, and it has come to be the well-nigh universal opinion that we should consider these schedules entirely apart from each other. I do not want the Senator from Idaho to feel that I have in the least receded from the position I assumed in regard to that resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. The resolution offered by the Senator from Iowa was practically, if not absolutely, in the language used by the Democratic platform, which declared for a revision of the tariff by schedules, and it was the language that the Republican platform in 1904, as I remember, repudiated as being destructive of the policy of protection.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember the language of the platform of 1904, nor do I remember that there was any similarity between my resolution and the Democratic platform. If so, it is greatly to the credit of the Democratic platform.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is my intention to read——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure there is one element in the resolution that could not have been in any political platform, because it related to the practice of offering amendments when a bill was before the Senate. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, where, I assume, it is enjoying a peaceful repose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, Mr. President; I trust it will sleep in peace until the trumpet sounds.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to get to the Senator's exact position. Nearly four years ago the Republican Party in national convention made a platform. Some Republicans thought it was wise and some thought it was otherwise. I never thought it was a very wise pronouncement on the subject of the tariff.

The convention of that party is to meet on the 18th day of next month. The presumption is that about the 20th day of the month another platform will be announced, and adopted, I presume, by the convention. Now, does the Senator argue that we ought to remain quiescent so far as the proposed legislation is concerned until that platform has been announced?

Does the Senator further think that, in the event of a committee on resolutions, which committee is made up of one delegate from each State, being constituted so that it would contain a majority of low-tariff men, their views not corresponding with those of the Senator, and that convention in a moment of unwisdom should adopt that platform, that we ought to stand by that platform for the next four years?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not going to prophesy evil at the hands of my own party.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well——

Mr. HEYBURN. And I am not going to anticipate any such action.

Mr. GALLINGER. But suppose it happens.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to assume that the Republican Party will always be wise.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think it always has been wise?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Republican Party, in the summing up, has been wise.

Mr. GALLINGER. As a rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been wise enough to bring to and maintain prosperity to the people of the United States. That is wisdom.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator on that point, but I want to repeat the suggestion as to the Republican Party. There is a line of cleavage in the Republican Party that we can not ignore, and it is barely possible that in the next convention there will be a majority on the committee on resolutions which would not agree with the Senator from Idaho or with me on the question of the tariff.

I agree absolutely with the Senator from Idaho on the question of the tariff. I am a high-tariff man, and have always stood for it, and always will, and I would not be bound by a declaration from my own party or any other party which violated that principle, and I would not be bound for four years by any platform that destroyed the protective policy, whether it was on the part of my own party or any other party.

Mr. HEYBURN. The principle of protection is not subject to the changing whims of men accidentally in position. The last national convention introduced an element into its declaration in favor of protection that did not meet and does not now meet my approval or concurrence, but I take the principle of the protective tariff from the Republican Party as a concrete proposition. It stands for a protective tariff, as declared for in the platforms of the past, commencing with that of 1864.

Mr. President, I am not going to anticipate evil or discomfort at the hands of the convention which meets next month. I am going to have faith in the Republican Party always. The platform of the last convention declared in favor of what I call a lead-pencil tariff—one that was based upon the shifting and varying differences in the cost of production at home and abroad. I am in favor of a protective tariff the walls of which are sufficiently high to protect the people against inundation as well as against drought. That is protection. The other may be protection to-day and it may not be protection to-morrow. The difference in the cost of an article in Germany to-day and the cost of the same article in this country to-day may be radically different from the difference that will exist three months from now.

Would the Senator from Iowa wait for these changing conditions and immediately upon a change occurring proceed to legislate to correct any discrepancies that might exist?

Mr. CUMMINS. As I said the other day, I regard the technical expression of the platform of 1908 as very unfortunate. I do not believe that there is any such thing as ascertaining the cost of production, either here or abroad; that is to say, the cost of production at one time will be different from that at another. The cost of production of one industry will be different in another of the same kind, and what is true here is also true abroad. But while the platform of 1908 is not, therefore, a formula, it is a guide. It indicates that we want a tariff wall high enough to enable, generally speaking, our industries to supply our own markets but low enough so that if our industries or producers raise their prices above the point of a reasonable profit that then competition or importation from abroad shall flow over the wall and correct and prevent the cupidity of our own people.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. What the Senator really wishes is that whenever we have differences at home we will call in the Hessians.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; the Hessians are not confined to other countries. We have Hessians, unfortunately, in our own land, and I am not willing to allow the avarice of a domestic producer to take from me what belongs to me, even though I must set against him the avarice of a foreign producer.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator loses sight of the fact that the greatest attribute of our country is opportunity in our own country. If a condition arises that is oppressive, the field is open to others to enter to correct the evil; but we do not want them to enter in foreign lands, nor do we want the foreigner to correct that evil. It will be corrected through the medium of opportunity in our own fields of industry and enterprise. That is the true science of government.

Mr. CUMMINS. That used to be so.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is so now.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not true any longer. There are great fields of industry in which there is no competition at home.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not say competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Or substantially no competition. There are great fields of industry in which opportunity no longer exists.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not conceive it. The opportunity does exist. It is equal to every man and may be taken advantage of. If they do not do it, then you want to inquire closely as to whether or not the evil exists, because wherever an evil exists in this country, under our system, the opportunity exists to cure it, for the people are supreme.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, just a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not concur in that conclusion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know the Senator does not. I have heard him so express himself.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I do agree with regard to the other. I readily admit, if we had free, substantial competition at home, so that the price of every commodity manufactured here would be reduced to the fair American level, then high protective duties upon competitive products would not be a serious evil. But inasmuch as that competition has been driven out and inasmuch as we are told that the tendency of the times is toward combinations and trusts and big business that do not admit any rivals, we must not allow our tariff wall to be built so high that these combinations can exact whatsoever they please for their product.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, no Senator can discuss the tariff question with me who takes as his text monopolies and combinations. Those are evils that can be cured at home. We do not need to send the patient to the springs of some foreign country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well——

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, a moment. There is another thought which comes to me. One of the greatest objects of protection in our country is our money. We want to protect the money that belongs in the aggregate to all the people, so that it may be available to develop enterprise and to maintain it, and that any policy of government which results in sending out into foreign countries, never to return, millions and hundreds of millions of dollars needs to be closely watched and closely guarded.

One of the great assets of the people of this country is the money of the country; not of the individual, but the money in the aggregate in the country is a thing to be guarded and protected by our system of tariff legislation. It is a question of balance of trade. If we buy more abroad than we sell abroad, we are in the red, as bankers would say; we are on the wrong side of the ledger to the extent of the difference between the purchases.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. If we sell more abroad than we buy, then the people—I do not mean the Government now, the Government has nothing to do with it—the people benefit to the extent of the difference between our sales abroad and our purchases abroad. To the extent of that difference we are ahead.

Now, that is keeping the money in this country, and money wherever it is is active; that is to say, it is available. Offer money and opportunity, and labor will get to work.

Now, we hear talk to-day about the poverty of the people and how they are going to lift the burden from them. The working people of this country have as much money in banks to their credit as have all the national banks and the State banks combined. In the savings banks alone—I will give you the figures exactly—the working people that you are pitying so much have $4,212,583,599. None of that belongs to the capitalists, none of that belongs to the trusts, none of that belongs to combinations of trade or business, but it is a surplus money that the wage earner had after he kept his family and educated it and paid the expenses of living and reserved a free margin for current business. He put that in the bank. He has it there.

The national banks had only $5,477,991,156. The State banks had $2,777,566,836. It is estimated by bankers—and it can be verified by anyone familiar with the subject—that 25 per cent of the money in those banks is comprised of the deposits of working people, who choose to put it in these banks rather than in savings banks.

So you see my statement is borne out by the figures when I say that the workingmen are richer than the capitalists in this country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to complete the figures. There are twenty-nine million and odd hundred thousand workingmen in the United States, according to the census; individuals engaged in industrial occupation—29,000,000 of them. With a population of 90,000,000, one-third of them are children under the age of activity. Take that third from the 90,000,000 and you have 60,000,000, and out of that 60,000,000 there are 29,000,000 engaged in industrial enterprises. That does not mean that they are engaged in speculations. It means that they are engaged in earning something to be drawn from the general wealth of the country.

Now, that is to be protected. First, you must protect the country against the passage into foreign lands and foreign business of our money. Without the money, we are poor. With the money, opportunity is unlimited and unbounded; and the opportunity does not rest in trusts and combinations any more than it rests in the individual.

One Senator stood up here to-day and told about how once he was a common laborer and now he is a capitalist. That is true all along the line. The capitalist of to-day is the workman of to-morrow. The three generations of shirt sleeves regulate that. The workingman of to-day is a capitalist of to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are always more workingmen, though, than capitalists.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the reason why the workingmen demand that they shall have their share of protection. Where you protect one capitalist you protect a thousand workingmen under the protective tariff policy. If you take it by numbers you can count it that way. If you take it by dollars and cents then, I repeat, the workingmen and working women in this country are as rich as all the capitalists combined.

So I want to get rid of this talk about the workingman and the capitalist and about their being arrayed against each other, and about the capitalist who is spoken of as though the capitalists are combinations or trusts. They are not. Out of all the capitalists represented by the three billion dollars in the two classes of banks, I suppose there is not 1 per cent of them that could be identified or classed with monopolies.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only reply because I would not have it understood that I disagree with very much that has just been said by the Senator from Idaho. He has never heard me express pity for the American citizen. I think he is to be envied the world over.

I have never put my insistence or demand for a reduction of these duties upon the ground suggested by the Senator from Idaho. Protection means, of course, that we shall do our work at home and supply our own markets; but whenever protection rises so high that those who are producing the protected articles can charge more than a fair price, then the persons who receive the unfair prices are enjoying all the benefits of monopoly and they are exacting from those who deal with them, unjustly, a part of that which they earn.

Mr. HEYBURN rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, wait a moment. I do not want to encourage importations. I do not want to fix any duty that will increase importations, for I know that when the duties on some of these things are reduced, if there be a menace of importation the American producer will reduce his prices and in that way preserve his market just as fully and completely as he preserves it now, but he will be compelled to sell to those who use what he produces at a fair price lest his foreign competitor shall interfere with his market.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the Senator would coerce the producer into selling at a price that in his judgment was below what the importer could sell it at?

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, I have said repeatedly selling at a fair price.

Mr. HEYBURN. But who is to say whether it was fair or not?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is for the Congress of the United States to say——

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh!

Mr. CUMMINS. What duty is required to enable the producer to sell at a fair price.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment, if you please. I will finish and I will not recur to the subject again. I know it has been the general custom heretofore to allow a producer to say what duty he should have, and of course no producer has ever named a sum that would subject him to any risk whatever.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why should he?

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to transfer that responsibility to Congress, and let Congress upon the evidence and knowledge it may have determine what duty ought to be given to the producer, so that he can make what he wants to make and sell it at a fair profit.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, I desire briefly to say, because I am going to detain the Senate but a few minutes more, the Senator's proposition amounts to this: Congress has fixed the price and the profit in business. That was my objection to that peculiar phrase in the platform of the last Republican convention. It was to allow Congress to say what constituted a profit that should be satisfactory to the producer. If we had the people divided in two classes, with the line between them, the producers on one side and the consumers on the other, assuming that the producers consume nothing and the consumers produce nothing, we might possibly, in dealing with the two distinct classes of people, feel called upon to protect one from the other—that is, you protect one cat from another. Such is not the condition. There are as many consumers as producers and as many producers as consumers in this country. They are not separate and distinct individuals. They are the identical persons, one producing what another consumes, and that which he himself participates in the consumption of. The man who makes cloth in the mill for wages himself participates in the consumption of it. The man who buys it furnishes the person who produces it with his line of commodity.

I did not intend to enter upon an extended discussion of this question this evening. I was somewhat drawn into it without intending to do so. When the Senator was speaking I made some notes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not made any speech this afternoon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think when the RECORD is printed it will show the Senator has covered some pages. I do not object to questions freely and liberally asked. I do not, however, desire to be placed in the position of circulating among my constituents the speeches of the opposition. On questions of this kind I have to rely upon the sending out of the remarks that are made in the interest of the people in the shape of documents.

The newspapers are liberal. I do not know whether they claim that they ever helped to enact any important piece of legislation or not. I know that they have spoken at times rather lightly and flippantly of the fact that the tariff bill was still under consideration, and that Mr. So-and-so was speaking all day upon it, or that he was completely—I was going to use a commonplace—knocked out by some other person.

That is the class of information that the world gets in regard to the consideration that we give these great questions. I should think they would take a pride in assuming a position where they could say to the world and where it would be written in history that they took strong positions on great questions and contributed to the determination of them. That not being the condition existing, I want what I say here to go out just about as I say it, and with such interruptions in the way of questions or suggestions as Senators may desire to interpose.

I merely make that suggestion because I do not care to stand here and make a speech or read an address on it. I want to discuss it, argue it, and an interchange of thought and ideas to be embodied in what I say with the ideas and interchange with other Senators.

Now, I will submit to any question the Senator may ask.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must be under a misapprehension. I supposed the Senator from Idaho was speaking in my time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I proposed a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HEYBURN. I objected to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. And thereupon before it was determined at all the Senator from Idaho arose to discuss it. I have been under the impression that all this time I was yielding him an indulgence, whereas he evidently thinks that I have been trespassing upon his time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I regret that there was a misunderstanding. When I rose and was recognized by the Chair I objected to the proposal of unanimous consent, and that of course ended it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not understand that the Senator from Idaho objected to it, and I am very sorry to hear it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina as modified by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire then to give notice, and I do this with deference to both the majority and the minority members of the Finance Committee, that in so far as I can control the matter by my objection, the metal schedule will be kept before the Senate during the time the unfinished business has a right to occupy the attention of the Senate. I do that in order that those who may desire to speak upon it will know that it is our purpose to vote upon the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Idaho as objecting to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. HEYBURN. I objected to all requests for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a single word. I certainly should not have——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Have I the recognition of the Chair this moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator not only objects to the amendment offered to my request by the Senator from Iowa, but he objects to my request?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I object to all requests made for proposing to fix a time to vote upon the question. I only want to say that at this late hour in the day and in this temperature I will not further indulge in making remarks that I thought opportune to fill up the time until adjournment. Otherwise I should not have opened the question at all.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to give notice that to-morrow at the close of the morning hour I will submit a few remarks on the pending bill to revise the metal schedule.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, I desire to give a notice in regard to Senate resolution 315, and to state that it is regarded by the minority of the committee as a question of the highest privilege and that it is the purpose of the minority to hold it constantly before the attention of the Senate until an agreement is made for a date on which a vote upon the question can be had.

Mr. CULLOM. I have two communications which I desire to present to the Senate. One is a letter from Dr. Slaymaker, of Chicago, dated May 16, which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

3017 WASHINGTON BOULEVARD,
Chicago, May 16, 1912.

Senator S. M. CULLOM, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CULLOM: I appreciated very much your reply to my letter in regard to Senator LORIMER. The Senator is improving, but quite slowly. He was thoroughly tired out when he came down with an attack of grippe and bronchitis. He had a most persistent and harassing cough. This was accompanied by an irregularity of the heart which caused me considerable apprehension. He is improving, but has very little reserve strength. A few moments of earnest conversation seem to thoroughly exhaust him and make his return to Washington on Monday, the 20th, quite out of the question.

I regret so much for his sake that the consideration of his case is to come up then, for he seems to feel very strongly the necessity of his being there. If he had a little more chance to accumulate strength, I believe that he can be there without harm to himself. At present it really would be almost suicidal for him to attempt it.

I believe he can safely return to Washington some time in June.

With great respect, I am, very truly,

S. R. SLAYMAKER.

Mr. CULLOM. I have also a telegram which I received from my colleague [Mr. LORIMER] on the day before yesterday, I believe, dated May 19, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., May 19, 1912.

Senator SHELBY M. CULLOM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I understand committee will report on Monday. My doctor says I am getting better, but will not consent to my leaving my home now. I do not want unnecessary delay. I am more anxious than anybody else could be to have the matter disposed of, but I think I should have the privilege of being in Washington when the date to vote is agreed upon and during the consideration of my case in the Senate. If you will object to the setting of a date for vote until I can return to Washington I will be very thankful to you.

WM. LORIMER.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, that is all that I know about the case. I have no interest in the matter, except that this gentleman shall have a fair showing and be here, if he is able to be, when we dispose of the case.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, I only desire to say that there is no disposition to set any time that will work a hardship on Senator LORIMER, but it is a matter of the highest privilege, a matter in which everyone is very much interested, a matter of great importance, and it has been before the Senate for a very long time. We therefore feel that it should be disposed of and that a date for a vote should be agreed upon at the earliest possible moment. We do not feel that it is necessary for Senator LORIMER to be here at the time when we agree upon a date, provided we can agree upon a date that will allow him in all probability, under the advice of his physician, to be present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 23, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 22, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful Father, we approach Thee with renewed faith and confidence in the immutability of Thy character, in the overruling of Thy providence, and the precious promises of Thy word. Create within us clean hearts and renew a right spirit within, that we may go forward with patience, courage, and fortitude wherever duty leads; that we may make for ourselves a record upon which we may look back without regret in the closing hours of this life and pass serenely on to the great beyond fully prepared for whatever awaits us there. In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6174. An act for the erection of a public building at the city of Douglas, State of Arizona;

S. 6203. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Arkansas;

S. 6380. An act to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris;

S. 6646. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 6847. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 6851. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 20586. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 18712. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 6174. An act for the erection of a public building at the city of Douglas, State of Arizona; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 6203. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Arkansas; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 6380. An act to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 6646. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 6847. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 6851. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Pensions

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, House bill (H. R. 20586) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, with Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

FREE AND EFFICIENT SEAMEN.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the minority views on the bill (H. R. 23673) to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen. (H. Rept. 645, pt. 2.)

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FRIAR LANDS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 17756, respecting the friar lands in the Philippine Islands. When the House adjourned on Wednesday last the matter in controversy was the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit, I should like to be heard somewhat further on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the proper determination of the pending points of order is of more importance than the bill itself. The bill H. R. 17756, has been amended in only one particular. On Wednesday, May 8, it was amended on page 2, line 6, after the word "Islands," by inserting "unless the Philippine Government shall hereafter provide otherwise by appropriate legislation either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts." This appears at page 6073 of the RECORD.

That amendment was, upon a roll call, deliberately adopted by a vote of 187 to 43. May 15, the previous question having been ordered on the bill, I moved to recommit it to the Committee on Insular Affairs, with instructions to report it back with an amendment adding at the end of the bill the words—

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to increase the amount of friar lands which any corporation may hold. [RECORD, p. 6522.]

Thereupon the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] offered as a substitute the following:

That the bill be recommitted with instructions to report the bill back forthwith with an amendment striking out the following language inserted as an amendment after the word "Islands," on page 2, line 6, to wit:

"Unless the Philippine Government shall hereafter provide otherwise by appropriate legislation either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts."

I made the point of order "that the motion to recommit, offered by the gentleman from Colorado, attempts indirectly to do what could not be done directly by the House—to strike out an amendment already adopted." The Speaker said:

Of course this condition attaches to it, that the matter in the substitute must be germane; that it would have been germane or in order as an amendment when the bill was pending.

Thereupon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said:

I do not think the gentleman's substitute is germane to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recommit, but I do believe it would be germane to move to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out all after the word "that" and insert the following; that is, insert the original bill.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] said:

I am offering the original bill as a substitute, with instructions that the original bill be reported back forthwith, and on that motion I move the previous question.

He withdrew his original substitute. His motion, as reported by the Clerk (RECORD, p. 6523), does not purport to amend my motion to recommit, but it is to "strike out all after the enacting clause in the original bill and insert the following," the following being the original bill itself, word for word, but omitting the amendment adopted by the House on May 8. In other words, it proposes simply to strike out the amendment of May 8, and to accomplish it by indirection.

Against that motion I made points of order, which, for convenience and conciseness, I will restate as follows:

1. The motion to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert is not germane to my motion to recommit nor to the instructions therein contained.

2. The motion to strike out and insert is not in order while a motion to perfect is pending.

3. The motion to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert certain matter is not an amendment to the amendment contained in my motion to recommit, but is a separate and independent motion, which could not in any event be voted upon until my motion proposing to perfect the paragraph shall have been disposed of. It would then have to be passed upon as a separate motion to recommit, whereas, the previous question having been ordered on the bill, the rule permits only one motion to recommit.

4 (and most important of all). The motion of the gentleman from Colorado proposes to accomplish indirectly what the House itself can not do directly, namely, to eliminate the amendment adopted by a yea-and-nay vote, making no other change whatever in the bill.

THE QUESTION OF GERMANENESS.

The question of germaneness can not be brushed aside with the mere suggestion that if my amendment is germane to the bill the bill must be germane to my amendment. The bill contains several distinct substantive propositions. It amends existing law by declaring—

(a) That all lands heretofore or hereafter acquired by virtue of the preceding section (friar lands) shall constitute a part and portion of the public domain of the Government of the Philippine Islands; and

(b) Shall be held, sold, and conveyed, or leased temporarily, under the same limitations and restrictions as are provided in this act for the holding, sale, conveyance, or lease of the public (Crown) lands in said islands;

(c) That deferred payments shall be payable "in money prescribed for the payment of principal and interest of the bonds authorized," etc.;

(d) That all moneys realized or received from sales or other disposition of said lands * * * shall constitute a trust fund;

(e) That "actual settlers and occupants at the time said lands are acquired by the Government shall have the preference over all others to lease, purchase, or acquire their actual holdings within such reasonable time as may be determined by said Government, without regard to the extent of their said holdings."

As some of these occupants may be corporations, my amendment provides that this provision shall not be construed to increase the amount of friar lands which any corporation may hold. The amendment of the gentleman from Colorado makes no mention whatever of corporations or the amount of lands they may hold, or to anything whatsoever contained in my motion to recommit, but does embody all the other substantive propositions above mentioned.

"When it is proposed to refer with instructions, an amendment to the instructions should be germane thereto." (5 Hinds, 6888; ruling by Robert C. Winthrop, Speaker, Feb. 6, 1849.) That is to say, it must be germane, not merely to some part of the bill itself, but to the instructions embodied in the motion to recommit.

As the result of some investigation I am unable to find that any substitute for the original bill was ever admitted against a point of order by way of amendment to a motion to recommit with instructions, and certainly not after the previous question has been ordered upon the bill. The instructions may be amended, but the proposed amendment thereof must be germane to the instructions contained in the original motion to recommit.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman at that point with a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I prefer not to be interrupted at this point, but to conclude my remarks, and then I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, this so-called substitute is not in any event in the form of an amendment to the amendment embodied in the instructions involved in my motion to recommit, those instructions being merely to perfect by an amendment the text which the so-called substitute proposes to strike out.

I do not contend that it is necessary that a substitute proposing to strike out an entire paragraph or section, or an entire bill, must be strictly germane to an amendment proposing to perfect the text of a paragraph, section, or bill. It must be germane to the subject matter of the bill, but not necessarily to the proposed amendment perfecting the text. The reason for this is that the substitute and the amendment perfecting the text are independent motions. The rule is (Rule XIX):

When a motion or proposition is under consideration a motion to amend and a motion to amend that amendment shall be in order, and it shall also be in order to offer a further amendment by way of substitute, to which one amendment may be offered, but which shall not be voted on until the original matter is perfected.

When there is an amendment and an amendment to an amendment, a substitute is not a further amendment to the amendment, for that would be in the third degree, but it is an entirely independent motion and can not be considered until after the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, if there be one, shall have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman whether he is not making a mistake about what position this last amendment, the one that is in controversy, contained in his motion to recommit, sustains to the bill. What the gentleman has just said would indicate that he regards the amendment proposed in his motion to recommit, and to which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] is offering a substitute, as an amendment to the amendment, but that is not correct, is it?

Mr. OLMSTED. No; if I so stated I did not intend that meaning. My motion to recommit asked that it be recommitted with instructions to report an amendment to the bill. There is no amendment pending to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman about the limitation of what a corporation may own is not an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. No; it is an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is speaking merely of the germaneness of the matter. If the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] had offered this bill as an amendment to the gentleman's proposition, then it seems to the Chair it could not have been ruled out of order as being in the third degree. I do not see how the gentleman figures out that part of his argument.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I probably have not made myself clear. I do not think his amendment would be an amendment, if it was an amendment to mine at all, in the third degree; but it is not an amendment to my amendment. It is a substitute for the whole bill, and if treated as an amendment to my amendment it is not germane, because it is upon a subject entirely different from my amendment, namely, the amount of land which corporations may hold. His amendment inserting the whole bill is upon three or four different substantive propositions, related to each other, but not related to the matter proposed in my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in his own way.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman now yield, inasmuch as he has been interrupted?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to ask the gentleman a question bearing upon one of his positions, if I get it right, and that is this: I understand the gentleman to argue that my motion to recommit is not in order, upon the ground that it is not germane to his motion. The gentleman does not take the position, in other words, that my motion to recommit is not germane to the bill, but the gentleman argues, further, that it must be germane to his motion and be amendatory of his motion. Is that the position the gentleman takes?

Mr. OLMSTED. I take the position that if his motion can be treated as an amendment to my proposed instructions, then it is out of order because not germane to the amendment proposed in my instructions.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman's position, then, virtually amounts to this: That while I might desire to offer a substitute, and I would be permitted to offer a substitute that would effect a change in the entire structure of the bill, yet if the gentleman obtained the floor first and moved to recommit on some trivial and inconsequential item in the bill I would be precluded, then, from offering my substitute, for he could raise a point of order against my substitute simply upon the ground that it was not germane to the item included in his motion. That is what his proposition amounts to.

Mr. OLMSTED. In the first place, my amendment is not trivial or inconsequential. In the second place, the gentleman has a right——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; but if it were trivial and inconsequential the rule would be the same?

Mr. OLMSTED. Just the same.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman could absolutely shut me out or shut out any other Member.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the gentleman is shut out, it is by the rules and not by me. My proposition is that if you treat his substitute as an amendment to my amendment then it is not germane, because it is not germane to the subject matter of my amendment, but my position is that his amendment is not germane to mine. The gentleman proposes a substitute to my amendment, and on that point my proposition is that a motion to strike out and insert is not in order while a motion to perfect is pending.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Suppose my motion to recommit also embraced the gentleman's proposition. What would the effect then be?

Mr. OLMSTED. A motion to strike out and insert is not in order at all while a motion to perfect is pending. If his motion had been offered first it would have had to be postponed until mine had been acted upon, and when mine has been acted upon then there has been action upon one motion to recommit, and the previous question having been ordered on the bill, the rule forbids that any other motion shall be made.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me there?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that his motion to recommit, as it appears in the RECORD, does not say to report forthwith.

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes, it does.

Mr. GARRETT. I was under that impression; I beg the gentleman's pardon, it does not so show in the RECORD, and I think that the gentleman ought to modify it so that may be done or we will have to vote it down.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have no objection at all.

This leads us to the next branch of the case.

A MOTION TO STRIKE OUT OR TO STRIKE OUT AND INSERT IS NOT IN ORDER WHILE A MOTION TO PERFECT IS PENDING.

My proposed amendment, as already stated, is to perfect the bill by adding certain words thereto. In Fifth Hinds, 5771, it was ruled that—

While amendments are pending to the section, a motion to strike it out may not be offered.

In section 5790 it was held that—

To a motion to insert words in a bill, a motion to strike out certain words of the bill may not be offered as a substitute.

But even had the motion of the gentleman from Colorado been made in advance of my own, it could not, under the rules and precedents, be considered until my motion perfecting the text had been disposed of.

When it is proposed to perfect a paragraph, the motion to insert or strike out, being already pending, must remain in abeyance until the amendments to perfect have been moved and voted on.

And again:

An amendment in the nature of a substitute may not be voted upon until the original matter is perfected. (5 Hinds, 5753.)

It thus appears that a motion to strike out or to strike out and insert is not an amendment to an amendment, but is an original, separate, independent, and distinct motion. A motion to perfect the paragraph is preferential. If the motion to strike out is first made, it must stand aside until the motion to amend has been disposed of, but if not previously made, a motion to strike out or to strike out and insert can not be made while the motion to amend is pending. My motion is to perfect the bill by adding a certain provision thereto. The motion to strike out the whole bill is not only not germane to my amendment, but is not even in order while my amendment is pending.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. OLMSTED. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has continually referred to his motion to recommit as an amendment to perfect the bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think it is perfectly clear my motion to recommit is a motion to recommit with instructions to report an amendment perfecting the text of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. But suppose the so-called perfection of the bill was to be obtained by cutting something out instead of adding something to it, what would be the parliamentary difference in the situation? Is the gentleman seeking to strengthen his position merely by claiming his amendment is a perfection of the bill?

Mr. OLMSTED. I am seeking to sustain my point of order by reciting the rules and precedents. I proceed now to the next branch of the case.

THE MOTION TO STRIKE OUT ALL AFTER THE ENACTING CLAUSE AND INSERT CERTAIN MATTER, BEING A SEPARATE MOTION, CAN NOT BE VOTED UPON UNTIL THE MOTION PERFECTING THE PARAGRAPH HAS BEEN DISPOSED OF, BECAUSE, THE PREVIOUS QUESTION HAVING BEEN ORDERED, THE RULE PERMITS ONLY ONE MOTION TO RECOMMIT.

The motion of the gentleman from Colorado is a second motion, whereas the previous question having been ordered on the bill, the rule permits only one motion to recommit to be made. As the motion to strike out and insert can not be considered while my motion is pending, and even if made first, would have to stand aside until the disposition of my own; and it naturally follows that it is not in order at all. The rule is positive and distinct that, the previous question having been ordered, one motion to recommit, and no other, is in order. Whatever disposition shall be made of my motion, whether it shall prevail or shall be voted down, its final disposition will be the disposition of one motion to recommit. Ordinarily the motion to strike out all after the enacting clause would then be in order; but, the previous question having been ordered, it is precluded by the rule, for its consideration would be the consideration of a second motion, in violation of the rule.

AN AMENDMENT TO STRIKE OUT AN AMENDMENT ALREADY ADOPTED IS NOT IN ORDER, AND THE HOUSE CAN NOT BY INDIRECTION ACCOMPLISH WHAT IT CAN NOT DO DIRECTLY.

When the House has solemnly and deliberately voted an amendment into a bill, there is nevertheless a method provided by the rules whereby it may again be passed upon. Rule XVIII provides:

When a motion has been made and carried or lost, it shall be in order for any member of the majority, on the same or succeeding day, to move for the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions except the consideration of a conference report or a motion to adjourn.

That highly privileged motion was not made in this case, either upon the day on which the amendment was adopted or upon the succeeding day. It is now substantially made by the gentleman from Colorado, one week after the adoption of the amendment and by a gentleman who did not vote in the majority.

An inspection of the papers discloses the fact that the gentleman's amendment to strike out the whole bill, including the amendment of May 8, and insert the original bill, omitting just the language of that amendment, neither amending nor changing any other part of the bill in so much as the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." Indeed, that is the avowed purpose of the author, as stated by himself.

I do not contend that when a paragraph has been perfected by amendment the entire paragraph may not still be stricken out, including the amendment. I do contend that such a motion is not in order here, because it would be a further motion after my motion to recommit had been disposed of; and I do contend that under no circumstances can any amendment be stricken out or eliminated unless the whole paragraph, section, or bill, as the case may be, shall be stricken out, or else changed in some part other than by leaving out the language of the amendment originally adopted by the House.

Words inserted by amendment may not afterwards be changed, except that a portion of the original paragraph, including the words so inserted, may be stricken out if in effect it presents a new proposition, and a new coherence may also be inserted in place of that stricken out. (5 Hinds, 5758.)

The gentleman from Colorado presents no new proposition, no new coherence, no new anything, except the elimination of the amendment heretofore adopted by the House.

In Fifth Hinds, 5759, we find that—

Words once inserted in a paragraph by way of amendment may not be stricken out by another motion to amend, but words on the same subject, even though inconsistent, may be added to the paragraph.

That ruling was made January 31, 1826, by John W. Taylor, of New York, Speaker.

It is not in order to amend an amendment that has been agreed to; but the amendment, with other words of the original paragraph, may be stricken out in order to insert a new text of a different meaning. (5 Hinds, 5763.)

In the pending case it is not proposed to insert a new text of a different meaning, but merely to insert the old text with the omission of the amendment heretofore adopted.

April 12, 1828, the proposition having been made to amend by striking out a portion of the amendment already agreed to by the House, Speaker Andrew Stevenson, of Virginia, as reported in Fifth Hinds, 5764—decided that the motion could not be received, as the amendment from which it was proposed to strike out a portion had been agreed to by the House. Although it was open to be amended by adding to it, it could not be altered by striking out any of the words to which the House had agreed.

February 25, 1837, James K. Polk, of Tennessee, Speaker, decided that—

It would not be in order to move to strike out any part of the adopted amendment, but it would be in order to add a paragraph or a proviso to it. (5 Hinds, 5765.)

Words embodying a distinct substantive proposition being agreed to as an amendment, it is not in order to amend by striking out a part of those words with other words. (5 Hinds, 5766.)

It has been held, certainly for more than 80 years, that a proposition which has for its purpose the mere elimination of an amendment already agreed to is not in order. The authorities to the effect that that can not be accomplished indirectly are equally numerous and conclusive.

In Fifth Hinds, 5529, it is laid down that—

It is not in order to do indirectly by a motion to commit with instructions what may not be done directly by way of amendment.

This ruling was made in 1859 by James L. Orr, of South Carolina, Speaker, who, as reported by Hinds—stated that inasmuch as it was not competent for the House to amend the bill in the manner proposed—the same not being germane—it was not in order for the House to instruct the committee to do what the House itself could not do.

This ruling was on a motion to recommit a bill to the Committee on Territories with instructions. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair, but it was laid on the table by a vote of 118 to 95.

February 13, 1851, Speaker Howell Cobb, of Georgia, passing upon a motion to recommit with instructions, said that—

It was also well settled that it was not competent for the House to instruct the committee to do what it could not do itself. He therefore sustained the point of order and decided the amendment to the instructions to be out of order. (5 Hinds, 5530.)

In Fifth Hinds, 5531, we find that in 1886 Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, moved to recommit a certain bill with instructions, and Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made the point of order that this Senate bill was the text that the House had stricken out, and that it was not in order to direct the committee to report that which the House had just rejected. The Speaker, John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, sustained the point of order, and held that it was not in order to move the recommitment of a bill with instructions to report matter which would not be in order if offered as an amendment in the House. The House had just voted to strike out the text of the Senate bill and insert a new proposition, and it was not therefore in order to do indirectly by way of recommitment what it could not do directly by amendment. That was an attempt by recommitment to insert what the House had stricken out, which is the reverse of the pending case, but the principle is precisely the same.

In Fifth Hinds, 5532, a similar ruling is reported as made in 1890 by Lewis E. Payson, of Illinois, Speaker pro tempore, who sustained such a point of order made by Mr. Funston, on the ground that—it was not in order to do indirectly by way of commitment what it was not in order to do directly by way of amendment, and that as the proposition submitted by Mr. Oates had been ruled out of order as an amendment it was not in order by way of recommitment.

On March 3, 1892, as reported in Fifth Hinds, 5533, Mr. De Armond, of Missouri, moved to amend a motion to recommit by adding thereto certain words. Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, and Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, made the point of order that the amendment was not in order because the proposed additional instructions would amend the bill by changing existing law, which the House itself could not do because in violation of one of its rules. That most excellent parliamentarian, Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, Speaker, in passing upon the point of order, said:

The Chair is of the opinion that it is not competent to do by indirection that which could not be directly done; that it is not competent for the House to direct the committee to do something which the committee itself could not do by reason of a rule restricting it from such action. Therefore the question for the Chair to determine is whether this amendment would be in order in Committee of the Whole.

He held that the amendment did change existing law, but that as it reduced expenditures it was, nevertheless, in order.

On February 17, 1893 (5 Hinds, 5534), a motion of Mr. Cummings, of New York, to recommit a bill with instructions to report a certain amendment was ruled out of order by Speaker Crisp upon the ground that the amendment proposed in the instructions would be in violation of the rule.

On March 20, 1894 (5 Hinds, 5535), a motion having been made to recommit a bill with instructions to report a certain amendment, Speaker Crisp "sustained the point of order, holding that the House can not do indirectly, by means of a motion to recommit, what can not be done directly by amendment."

On June 16, 1894 (5 Hinds, 5536), Speaker Crisp made a similar ruling, from which Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, appealed. The appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 158 to 57.

On June 27, 1894 (5 Hinds, 5537), Speaker Crisp again ruled out of order a motion to recommit, which contained instructions to amend in a manner contrary to the rules of the House.

On January 20, 1898 (5 Hinds, 5538), a motion of Mr. JOSEPH W. BAILEY, of Texas, to recommit the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions was, upon a point of order made by Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, passed upon by Speaker Thomas B. Reed, who ruled that "the motion to commit with instructions was not in order, upon the ground that a motion to commit, which would not be admissible as an amendment was not admissible as instructions."

On February 16, 1899 (5 Hinds, 5539), Mr. Hepburn, of Iowa, moved to recommit with instructions a certain bill, and Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, made the point of order that it was not in order to accomplish by a motion to recommit with instructions what could not be accomplished directly by an amendment. The Speaker sustained the point of order.

This ruling was by Speaker Reed. Mr. Hepburn appealed, and on motion of Mr. PAYNE, of New York, the appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 158 to 95.

On February 26, 1904, Mr. Meyer, of Louisiana, made a motion to recommit the naval appropriation bill with instructions. The Speaker sustained the point of order made by Mr. FOSS, of Illinois, and in his ruling said:

The Chair * * * is of the opinion that several of the instructions in the motion cover legislation, and therefore, as you can not do indirectly that which you can not do directly, the Chair sustains the point of order.

This ruling was made by Speaker CANNON.

In Fifth Hinds, 5541, it is reported that on March 1, 1905, Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, moved to recommit a certain bill with instructions to be reported back with an amendment. A point of order was made against it, and Speaker CANNON sustained the same, in the course of his opinion saying:

The Chair reads from the Digest: "It is not in order to move to recommit a bill with instructions to a committee to report an amendment which is not germane." Many precedents are given, running through a period of substantially 50 years. And again, the House can not do indirectly what it can not do directly. Therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.

In Fifth Hinds, 5889, a point of order having been made against a motion to recommit with instructions, Speaker Carlisle sustained the point, saying, in the course of his ruling:

It has been decided frequently that it is not competent for the House to accomplish indirectly, by reference to a committee with instructions, what could not be accomplished directly by offering an amendment on the floor—that is to say, if the bill which the proposed instructions direct the committee to report is not germane as an amendment it can not be brought before the House on a motion to recommit.

We have thus this long line of precedents, to which may be added the declaration of the present distinguished, able, and rigidly impartial occupant of the chair, Speaker CLARK, that to be in order now it must have been "in order as an amendment when the bill was pending."

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], speaking of the original motion of the gentleman from Colorado to strike out the amendment of May 8, said:

I do not think the gentleman's substitute is germane to the gentleman's motion from Pennsylvania to recommit.

But the second proposition is just as bad; indeed, it is precisely the same thing. It seeks to accomplish by instructing the committee to do what the House itself could not do, namely, to eliminate the amendment of May 8 without making any other change in the bill. If this attempt should be sustained there would be no end of legislation. We see bills coming out here with 40, 50, and sometimes 100 amendments, the discussion of which may have consumed weeks of time. If the previous question were not ordered, we might have as many motions to recommit as there are amendments in the bill, and in any event one motion would be in order to recommit the bill with instructions to bring it back again in its original form with all the amendments eliminated.

The highly privileged motion to reconsider affords ample opportunity to the House to undo its work in case of hasty action or of a close vote, and of course it can always be done by unanimous consent.

The fact that a similar device was successful in the last session has no bearing upon the decision of this case; it does not establish a precedent. In that case no point of order was made against the motion to recommit, which was therefore necessarily considered as having been submitted by unanimous consent. This is, in effect, a motion to reconsider, made long after the lawful time and by a gentleman who, having voted with the minority, is not entitled to make such a motion at all. It is furthermore, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has well said, an attempt to get a vote upon two motions, whereas at this stage of the proceedings, the rule permits only one motion to recommit to be made.

I submit that upon consideration of the rules and of the long line of precedents, and also of what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has so felicitously termed the "common sense of the proposition," the motion of the gentleman from Colorado must be ruled out of order.

The SPEAKER. This is one of the most troublesome and intricate questions that has been presented to be ruled on since the present occupant of the Chair was elected Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair allow me to interrupt with a question?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I was advised that some other Member had prepared a brief on this question.

The SPEAKER. Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts prepared a very able brief on the other side of this question, and if the gentleman from Colorado will read it, the Chair will hand it to him, as the Chair thinks it ought to be incorporated in the RECORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not here. The Chair would like to have it read to the House, because it is a very able document on the other side of this question. Read the typewritten matter first and then read the telegram. The Chair desires to thank both the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] for carefully preparing a brief and giving it to him in advance.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. GARDNER's brief reads as follows:

Mr. OLMSTED raises two points of order against Mr. MARTIN'S motion.

1. That Mr. MARTIN'S motion is out of order because it seeks to accomplish by motion to recommit that which would be inadmissable as an amendment. Mr. OLMSTED'S position is that the House, having accepted an amendment, may not reverse itself and strike out this identical amendment.

2. Mr. OLMSTED maintains that Mr. MARTIN'S instructions are not germane to the instructions contained in his own motion to recommit.

First. With regard to the first point of order, it is true that the weight of authority seems to be on Mr. OLMSTED'S side; but I can not help feeling that the decisions on which he rests were rendered hastily, without a full examination of the situation. The general principle of parliamentary law has always been that an amendment once adopted might not be acted upon a second time in the same stage of the bill. In subsequent stages, however, it is clearly in order, under general parliamentary law, to reject an amendment adopted in a previous stage. This is the practice of the Massachusetts Legislature, and probably in many others, at the present day. The principle is admirably laid down in an opinion given by Mr. Speaker Stevenson, volume 5, section 6207, Hinds' Precedents. (This opinion cites Mr. Speaker Onslow.)

Formerly a bill had three readings in the House of Representatives. The rules call for three readings to-day, but in practice there are but two readings, and in practice it is only pending the third reading that amendments are in order. Obviously there is need for a greater opportunity for the House to correct its own errors. This opportunity has been given by a rule which permits a motion to recommit with instructions after the previous question is ordered and pending the passage of the bill. In the words of the report made when this rule was adopted, in 1880, it affords "the amplest opportunity to test the sense of the House as to whether or not the bill is in the exact form it desires." (See RECORD, 46th Cong., 2d sess., p. 202.)

This purpose of the rule is manifestly defeated, if the House may not correct its own mistakes. Moreover, it can not be gainsaid that any bill is in a different stage when the question of its passage is pending from the stage in which it finds itself when the question of its engrossment and third reading is pending.

Second. With regard to the question of germaneness, Mr. Speaker Reed said on the subject of germaneness:

"The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the importance of the preservation of the rule which is expressed in the following language:

"'And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.'

"Originally the very greatest latitude was allowed, so that objects the most diverse were suddenly thrust upon the assembly. It was in order to correct that that there was established under general parliamentary law the doctrine that an amendment must be germane to the original or pending bill. The rules of the House of Representatives have embraced it in the form which the Chair has read." (RECORD, 51st Cong., 1st sess., p. 9101.)

But the subject before the House in this case is the Philippine bill. Mr. MARTIN'S motion thrusts no new question on the House. On the contrary, it is the very question that the House has been discussing. The fact that the instructions proposed by Mr. MARTIN are not germane to the instructions proposed by Mr. OLMSTED has nothing to do with the case provided the instructions offered by Mr. MARTIN are germane to the subject matter of the bill. It is true that in Hinds's Precedents (Vol. V, p. 6888) appears this statement: "When it is proposed to refer with instructions, an amendment to the instructions should be germane thereto." An examination of the ruling to which this statement refers fails to disclose whether or not Mr. Speaker Winthrop ruled the instructions out of order because they were not germane to the bill under consideration or because they were not germane to the instructions which they sought to amend.

To hold that Mr. MARTIN'S amendment is out of order because it is not germane to the instructions contained in Mr. OLMSTED'S motion to recommit would create a precedent which would put the House in the matter of instructions completely at the mercy of the first Member who could secure recognition.

If the Speaker is inclined to sustain Mr. OLMSTED'S point of order against endeavoring to accomplish by a motion to recommit that which could not have been done directly by amendment, and if the Chair overrules Mr. OLMSTED on the question of germaneness, I invite his attention to a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Blaine to the effect that the change of a single word in the text of a proposition is sufficient to prevent the Speaker ruling it out of order as one already disposed of by the House. (Hinds' Precedents, Vol. II, p. 1274.)

If the question of germaneness is settled in Mr. MARTIN'S favor, it ought to be a very easy matter for him to get a vote under the ruling made by Mr. Speaker Blaine.

During the reading the following occurred:

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, is it proper for me to make any comment that might be suggested by the brief of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. Why, certainly, but the gentleman had better read the whole document and then make his comments.

After the reading,

The SPEAKER. That telegram was sent by the secretary of the Massachusetts Legislature to Mr. GARDNER in answer to a telegram of inquiry which Mr. GARDNER sent. I am not certain that they call that legislative body a legislature; great and general court, I believe it is.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The telegram reads as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., May 20, 1912.

Hon. AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Bills in first reading are not amendable under rules of Massachusetts Legislature. Parliamentary authorities recognized by rule allow amendment in second and third reading, and amendments adopted or rejected in second reading may be reversed in third without reconsideration. This is invariable practice. Not sure about Parliament or other States, but think yes.

HENRY D. COOLIDGE.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to argue the points of order raised by the gentleman. I am not prepared to argue them. I have not given and have not been able to give a moment of research to this question, but I understand that the parliamentarians of the House, the gentlemen who are recognized as competent upon parliamentary questions and experienced in them, would give some attention to the question which was raised just before adjournment last Wednesday on the motion to recommit made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the substitute offered by myself. But I want to comment upon a statement made by Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts, which was just in line with the question that I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania a moment ago when he was arguing his point of order, and that is this: Mr. GARDNER said:

To hold that Mr. MARTIN'S amendment is out of order because it is not germane to the instructions contained in Mr. OLMSTED'S motion to recommit would create a precedent which would put the House in the matter of instructions completely at the mercy of the first Member who could secure recognition.

Now, in harmony with that statement, without knowing Mr. GARDNER had advanced it, I interrupted Mr. OLMSTED and asked him substantially this question. I said, in the first place, it seemed to be conceded I have a right to offer a substitute—at least it is offered and pending, and I do not understand that there is any likelihood that the Chair will rule my substitute out of order on the ground that it could not be offered at all. So it is established that I am entitled under the rules to offer a substitute to the motion to recommit made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Now, my substitute might effect a complete reconstruction of the whole bill; it might alter it in a dozen material particulars. I might, for instance, ask that the provision that authorized the Legislature of the Philippine Islands to "temporarily" lease these lands to be changed so as to put in a definite period of five years, so that it would be clearly fixed by act of Congress that the Philippine Legislature could lease these lands but for five years. I might want to put into this pending act the provision, for instance, that is in section 13 in reference to public lands. Section 13 of the organic law of the Philippine Islands authorizes the Philippine Government to enact rules and regulations for the sale, lease, and other disposition of the public lands, but it also contains a provision that before these legislative acts shall have the force and effect of law in the Philippine Islands they shall be first submitted to the President of the United States and be approved by him and then be by him submitted to the Congress at the next ensuing session, and then, unless Congress during the next ensuing session shall disapprove these acts, after the expiration of that period—after adjournment—the acts have the force and effect of law in the Philippine Islands. I might, for instance, want to embody such a substantial and, I think, proper and beneficial safeguard as that in this act and surround this legislation with it. These are material particulars in which my substitute motion to recommit might materially effect the pending legislation.

But the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is, if he could get the floor first and submit a motion to recommit upon some immaterial item, no matter how trifling, no matter how apparently his motion to recommit might be a subterfuge to defeat a meritorious and substantial motion, I would be barred by the fact that but one motion to recommit was in order. That is the only feature of the brief of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that I care to discuss.

I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that I feel justified and in good conscience able to take the position of pressing to the very limit the right of this House to act again upon this piece of legislation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has shown an ingenuity, an industry, and persistence in this matter that is worthy of a far better cause. There is not any question but that the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is technical in the extreme. He is submitting a motion to recommit which says that nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize a corporation to acquire any more than 2,500 acres of friar lands. What is there in this act, in the name of heaven, to lead any man to even suspect that such a construction could be placed upon it?

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman permit right there?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I should think the very words to which my amendment is added, that they may acquire without regard to the extent of their holdings, might afford some justification to such an amendment as mine.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]—and I think I know something about his views as to these land laws in the Philippines—I want to congratulate him at this time on showing the first evidence of solicitude that some corporation would get more than 2,500 acres of this land.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have always been in favor of that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that I ever suspected the gentleman from Pennsylvania harbored any such ideas.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to cut the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] off from a discussion of the point of order, but I am very anxious to conclude this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] very correctly thinks this ruling is very important. I do not know whether I agree with him that it is more important than the bill itself. This question has returned to plague most of the Speakers who ever occupied the chair, and the House, too. In one way and another it has been ruled on ever since the days of Mr. Speaker Taylor, away back in 1826. The situation is this: On the 8th day of this month of May the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] made a motion to add a certain amendment to the bill, and it was so done, and it was done on a roll call, the bill being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment was adopted by a very large majority. Either on that day or the succeeding day any Member who voted in the affirmative could have moved a reconsideration. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] could not do it, because he voted in the negative. So it remains in the bill. After the third reading of the bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] made a motion to recommit the bill containing an amendment to it. That is practically what it was. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] offered a substitute for the amendment which had just been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] in his motion to recommit. After some discussion one way and another the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] that there was a way for him to accomplish what he was after, provided the Chair ruled his substitute out of order, and that was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the original bill, leaving out the Olmsted amendment which had been adopted on the 8th of May.

This all took place on the 15th of May.

Mr. MANN. In order to keep the record correct, I will say the motion was to strike out all after the word "that."

The SPEAKER. That is correct. Thereupon the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] accepted the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and offered the original bill minus the Olmsted amendment, and thereupon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] made two points of order at once. One was that it was not germane to his amendment and the other that it was an attempt to do indirectly what the House could not itself do directly, thereby contravening both the rules and the practice of the House. In addition to these two chief questions there are two or three others of minor interest involved.

The Chair rules against the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] on the first proposition, accepting the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the entire bill as offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] must in the very nature of things be germane to any amendment that anybody could offer to the bill; that is, for purposes of a motion to recommit.

The contention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] on the subject of germaneness is not tenable. It has been held over and over again that a motion to recommit is amendable, and it has been held at least by one Speaker that a substitute for a motion to recommit is proper. There is no question whatever in the mind of the Chair that the bill itself minus the first Olmsted amendment, adopted on the 8th of May, is germane to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] incorporated in his motion to recommit. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it would not be germane.

The second point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is whether the thing can be done which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] is attempting to do; that is, to do indirectly on a motion to recommit what the House can not do directly—because that is what it is, and all of us, who have paid any attention to this wrangle, know that there is only one thing involved in that substitute, and that is whether you shall cut out the Olmsted amendment adopted on the 8th of May. It might as well have been offered in so many words for all practical purposes.

This question of whether the House on a motion to recommit can do indirectly what the House itself can not do, has been ruled on by every Speaker, almost, beginning with Mr. Speaker John W. Taylor, of New York, on the 31st day of January, 1826. The question was not always exactly in the shape in which this question presents itself, but the substance has always been the same, and the decisions have always been the same. Mr. Speaker Taylor ruled on it, and later Mr. Speaker Polk, and in later days Mr. Speaker Carlisle and Mr. Speaker Crisp ruled on it. Mr. Speaker Reed, when he was in the chair, ruled on it, and when he was on the floor raised a point of order, referred to the same decision, and held on the floor what he held in the chair; Mr. Speaker Henderson ruled on it; Mr. Speaker CANNON ruled on it.

They all ruled the same way; that is, that the House can not do indirectly on a motion to recommit that which it can not do by amendment before engrossment and third reading.

The contention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] that you can not have two propositions in a motion to recommit is not tenable. The motion to recommit is intended to give the House an opportunity to express its opinion, upon roll call if needs be, upon any proposition or propositions which have not been inserted in the bill, provided always, of course, that the proposition is germane to the bill itself.

The most elaborate opinion that was ever rendered on the question whether the House can do indirectly on a motion to recommit what it can not do directly by amendment was rendered by Mr. Speaker Carlisle, which I will read in a minute, in lieu of all the rest. But on one occasion Mr. Speaker Blaine refused to pass upon a question of the sort and submitted it to the House, and by a vote of about two-thirds the House took the same position that these other Speakers have taken, and on at least two occasions an appeal was taken from the ruling of the Chair, and the House on both occasions sustained the decision of the Chair by a vote of about 2 to 1.

This is in the Fifth Hinds, section 5531—

the previous question had been demanded on the passage of a bill restoring to the United States certain lands granted to railroads, when Mr. Robert R. Hitt, of Illinois, moved to recommit the bill with instructions to report the Senate bill, for which this substitute had been adopted that had just been voted out. Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made a point of order that the Senate bill was the text that the House had stricken out and that it was not in order to direct the committee to report that which the House had just rejected.

Of course, that was turning the question around.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, and held that it was not in order to move the recommitment of a bill with instructions to report matters which would not be in order if offered as an amendment in the House.

Nobody will contend, if some gentleman had arisen in his place and made a motion to strike out this Olmsted amendment which was inserted on the 8th of May, that the Chair would have entertained the motion.

Then, Mr. Speaker Carlisle continued:

The House had just voted to strike out the text of Senate bill and insert a new proposition, and it was not therefore in order to do indirectly, by way of recommitment, that which could not be done directly by way of amendment.

So, on that point the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] is out of order because the House can not by a motion to recommit do that which it can not do directly by amendment when a bill is in the amendable stage.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the motion to recommit made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] demanded recognition, and I think he should have been recognized before the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. I move, Mr. Speaker, the previous question upon the motion to recommit made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

The SPEAKER. The previous question has already been ordered.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The motion to recommit had not been made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following substitute to recommit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that when the gentleman from Colorado offered his substitute he then moved the previous question on the motion to recommit. That is agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No, sir; it was not ordered. The RECORD will show it. The RECORD will show that I am not even recognized. Gentlemen can not get up here and shout out, "I move the previous question," and without recognition claim that that establishes their proposition.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I submit this: The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] had his opportunity to offer a motion, which was in order, for a substitute for the motion proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He offered such a motion, the point of order was made, the Chair has sustained that point of order, and the gentleman from Colorado therefore has had his day in court and lost his case; and I submit that it is proper for the Chair to recognize me, I being temporarily in charge of the bill in the absence of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], to move the previous question on a motion to recommit, and bring this matter to a conclusion. I submit that under the precedents I am entitled to that recognition. The House can, of course, vote it down if it chooses.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, can I read from the RECORD what the status of the motion is?

The SPEAKER. We have already found out what the RECORD says. What was the suggestion that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made? The Chair did not hear it clearly.

Mr. MANN. My understanding was that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], when he offered his substitute, moved the previous question. I know he moved the previous question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; and the Chair refused to entertain it, and the RECORD so shows. The Chair said, "I will entertain that motion in a moment," but he never did entertain it.

Mr. MANN. The RECORD shows this, on page 6523, by the Speaker:

The gentleman from Colorado moves the previous question on his substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks under the practice of the House that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has the right of recognition to make the motion of the previous question. If the House does not want to order it, the House has its remedy, and that is to vote the motion down. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the motion to recommit. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 38 and the noes are 41.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 122, answered "present" 11, not voting 141, as follows:

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if the gentleman from Texas, Mr. HARDY, voted.

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. OLMSTED. I am paired with him, and I will change my vote from "aye" to "present."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire if the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON, voted?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. SISSON. I desire to change my vote from "no" to "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I offer the substitute motion to recommit, which is on the Clerk's desk, and on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute motion to recommit first.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not ask for the previous question until the substitute is reported.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair just stated.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Insular Affairs with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendments, to wit:

After the word "legislation," in the amendment inserted in line 6, page 2, strike out the words "either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts" and insert the following:

"But such legislation shall not go into effect or have the force of law until it has received the approval of the President, and when approved by the President it shall be submitted by him to Congress at the beginning of the next ensuing session thereof, and unless disapproved or amended by Congress at said session it shall at the close of such period have the force and effect of law in the Philippine Islands."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recommit and the amendment thereto.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, reserving the point of order, I will ask to have the motion again reported, as it was quite difficult to catch it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the motion to recommit.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the motion to recommit.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, just a word. I would like the attention of the gentleman from Colorado. If the gentleman from Colorado is willing to leave in the words "either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts" there will be no opposition to his motion.

The SPEAKER. Of course this is not debatable. Whatever is said is done by unanimous consent. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to recommit and the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. Is not the motion upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as amended?

The SPEAKER. That is correct. The gentleman from Colorado called it a substitute, but it is not a substitute. It is an amendment. The question now is on the amended motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the House, I report herewith the following bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reports back the bill with amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 65 of an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 65. That all lands that have been or may hereafter be acquired by virtue of the preceding section shall constitute a part and portion of the public domain of the Government of the Philippine Islands and shall be held, sold, and conveyed, or leased temporarily, under the same limitations and restrictions as are provided in this act for the holding, sale, conveyance, or lease of the public lands in said islands, unless the Philippine Government shall hereafter provide otherwise by appropriate legislation, either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts: Provided, That all deferred payments and the interest thereon shall be payable in money prescribed for the payment of principal and interest of the bonds authorized to be issued in payment for said lands by the preceding section, and said deferred payments shall bear interest at the rate borne by the bonds. All moneys realized or received from sales or other disposition of said lands, or by reason thereof, shall constitute a trust fund for the payment of principal and interest of said bonds, and also constitute a sinking fund for the payment of said bonds at their maturity. Actual settlers and occupants at the time said lands are acquired by the Government shall have the preference over all others to lease, purchase, or acquire their actual holdings within such reasonable time as may be determined by said Government without regard to the extent of their said holdings."

With the following amendment:

Add at the end of the bill the words:

"But nothing herein contained shall be construed to increase the amount of friar land which any corporation may hold."

Also, after the word "legislation," in the amendment inserted in line 6, page 2, strike out the words "either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts" and insert the following:

"But such legislation shall not go into effect or have the force of law until it has received the approval of the President, and when approved by the President it shall be submitted by him to Congress at the beginning of the next ensuing session thereof, and unless disapproved or amended by Congress at said session it shall, at the close of such period, have the force and effect of law in the Philippine Islands."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on either one of these amendments? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GARRETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BROWNING was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

BUREAU OF MINES AND MINING.

The SPEAKER. This exhausts the right of the Committee on Insular Affairs, and the Clerk will call the next committee.

Mr. FOSTER (when the Committee on Mines and Mining was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Mines and Mining, I call up the bill H. R. 17260.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17260) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of the Interior a Bureau of Mines," approved May 16, 1910.

The SPEAKER. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, and the Chair will ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] to take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MARTIN of Colorado in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17260) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of the Interior a Bureau of Mines," approved May 16, 1910.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act to establish in the Department of the Interior a Bureau of Mines, approved May 16, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That there is hereby established in the Department of the Interior a bureau of mining, metallurgy, and mineral technology, to be designated the United States Bureau of Mines, and there shall be a director of said bureau, who shall be thoroughly equipped for the duties of said office by technical education and experience and who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of $6,000 per annum; and there shall also be in the said bureau such experts and other employees, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, as may be required to carry out the purposes of this act in accordance with the appropriations made from time to time by Congress for such purposes.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the province and duty of the Bureau of Mines, subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to conduct inquiries and scientific and technologic investigations concerning mining, and the preparation, treatment, and utilization of mineral substances with a view to increasing health, safety, efficiency, economic development, and the prevention of waste in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, and other mineral industries, and concerning explosives and fuels and unfinished mineral products belonging to, or for the use of, the United States, with a view to their most efficient use; and to disseminate information concerning these subjects in such manner as will best carry out the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 3. That the director of said bureau shall prepare, publish, and distribute, subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, under the appropriations made from time to time by Congress, reports of inquiries and investigations, with appropriate recommendations of the bureau, concerning the nature, causes, and prevention of accidents, and the improvement of conditions, methods, and equipment, with special reference to health, safety, and prevention of waste in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, and other mineral industries; the use of explosives and electricity, safety methods and appliances, and rescue and first-aid work in said industries; the causes and prevention of mine fires; and other subjects included under the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the Bureau of Mines or any employee of said bureau to undertake any investigation or operation in behalf of any private party, except, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the health and safety of persons employed in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, or other mineral industries; nor shall the director or any member of said bureau have any personal or private interest in any mine or the products of any mine under investigation: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the employment by the Bureau of Mines, in a consulting capacity or in the temporary investigation of special subjects, of any engineer or other expert whose principal professional practice is outside of such employment by said bureau.

"SEC. 5. That for tests or investigations authorized by the Secretary if the Interior under the provisions of this act, other than those performed for the Government of the United States or State governments within the United States, a reasonable fee covering the necessary expenses shall be charged, according to a schedule prepared by the Director of the Bureau of Mines and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall prescribe rules and regulations under which such tests and investigations may be made. All moneys received from such sources shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after its passage."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is intended to more clearly define the work of the Bureau of Mines and also extend the work of this bureau to some parts of the mining industry of the country to which it is thought it may not now apply. In 1910, when the bill was passed establishing a Bureau of Mines, the great object of that bureau was to look after the questions of safety and health of those who work in the mines. Along about 1909 and 1910 we had in this country some very great catastrophes in mines, notably in Pennsylvania and West Virginia, which called the attention of the country to the dreadful loss of life which was taking place in mines scattered here and there throughout the land. Those who were here at that time are familiar with the passage of that bill through the House and through the Senate. We believe that the establishment of this bureau has been of great benefit in improving the condition of the methods of mining, and I believe the Committee on Mines and Mining fully believe that with this improved bill they will be able to go forward and do even better work in the future than has been done in the past. For years and years the metal-mining industry of the West, which has afforded so much wealth to our country, felt that it was not properly treated when this Bureau of Mines was established, and so in the Mining Congress in Chicago last October they asked and expected that some changes would be made in this law which would be of more benefit to that industry in the West. Then it has been discovered that in the quarrying industries wherever they may be located there has been little said and little done, so far as the National Government is concerned, for the protection of life and health of the people who work there. It is shown that in the metal-mining industry that there is almost as great a loss of life as there is in the coal-mining industry of the country. They do not meet with the great loss of life at any single mine, but each day when mines are in operation somewhere there is loss of life. I have here a long list of those who have lost their lives in the quarrying industries of a particular State in the Union, and so it is thought that there could be a great benefit brought about if this bureau was permitted to give some attention to the quarrying districts of the country and be the means of saving human life, and they would be able to show how better methods could be put in operation that would result in the saving of lives in such industries of the United States. It is a well-known fact that in the coal-mining industry tuberculosis is not especially prevalent among the miners there, but it is a fact that in quartz mining and in quarrying there is some peculiarity of the breathing of the dust that comes from the quarrying and from the mine so that there is more tuberculosis developed by that kind of mining than there is in the coal mining. Now, these problems can be looked into, they can be searched out by the Bureau of Mines by those who are trained in their especial work, who can go out into the different sections of the country and be able to show how it is possible to conserve human life.

The Mining Bureau, since it has been started, has purchased some cars; they have established those in different sections of the country where there are mine-rescue stations, and whenever a great catastrophe has occurred, like a mine fire or an explosion in a mine, these cars, with their assistants, have gone to those mines and rendered whatever assistance was possible to relieve those who were entombed in the mine. In the State of Illinois, when the great catastrophe at Cherry occurred, I think it will be remembered that the Mining Bureau attendants—those who were employed—went there and helped to save a number of miners.

They have not only gone to these places in times of disaster, but these cars have been taken to the mining centers, wherever it was possible to reach them, with the appropriation that they have had and there instruct the miners in first-aid work, in what to do in case of explosions, fires, or any accidents occurring about the mines. And I want to say this, with due respect to all the operators of the country: That I think very little opposition has ever been offered by any operator against the employees of the Bureau of Mines going into the mines and pointing out whatever improvements could be made in the way of saving human life.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. I want to state that the mining operators in the district I have the honor to represent are very glad to have this mining car come and instruct the miners.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is the case in nearly all instances in which they have gone to any mining center of the country. It is well understood that the Mining Bureau has no authority to go into any of the mines without the permission of the owners.

In the matter of explosives, the Mining Bureau has taken these explosives and tested them in reference to their safety, so that now it has gotten to be a fact that hardly any mine in the country will use any explosive without it is called a "safety explosive," or one of those which is called a "permissive explosive." Many explosives that the Mining Bureau examines are rejected for one reason or another as not being safe to be used in mines. I am glad to say, when these rescue cars go to mining centers that usually the miners are enthusiastic to learn what they can in reference to this work, and it is to their credit that in case of accident, where their comrades and those who have worked with them have met with an accident down under the ground, it is usually the case that these men want to rush in in the face of death to rescue those who have met with accident. You remember that there is a certain apparatus which can be used whereby these employees can go safely to the rescue of these entombed miners. They use what is called an oxygen generator, and then can walk into the mines where there are poisonous gases without being overcome, where, without one of them, a person would be able to travel but a little way within the mine. They have shown how these may be used, and I am glad to say that many of the mine operators of the country have bought this appliance and placed it where it is convenient in case of accident.

There is another great appliance that has been brought prominently into use not only in the mine-rescue work of the country, but in cases of asphyxiation from gases, which is known as the pulmotor. Some of you may have seen it, and no doubt all of you have read about it. By the use of this appliance, when a miner has been overcome by these poisonous gases, they can pump out the poisoned air and pump the oxygen in and restore him to life. And there are instances on record where a person appeared to be dead, and yet was brought to life by the use of the pulmotor.

So this class of appliances that have been used in the mine-rescue work, all that it has been possible to manufacture, have been bought by the governments of the world and by the mine operators. It is a well-known fact, shown by statistics, that in our own country a greater loss of life occurs in mining than occurs anywhere else in the world, and until 1910 the Federal Government practically did nothing to help stop this great loss of life. The bill which we propose to amend at this particular time, if the House so agrees, will explain more fully what is meant by the original act. There are some clauses in the original act which were possibly left undefinable, or at least there was a question whether they could do certain things or not. We have changed some of these provisions of the bill, more particularly explaining what is meant by the provisions of the bill which was passed in 1910. But the main object of this bill, as it was in the original act, is that the Bureau of Mines should still give special attention to the safety of the miners, improving the health conditions, and increasing the safety and efficiency and the economic development and the prevention of waste in mining, quarrying, and metallurgy.

Now, this is the province of the Bureau of Mines as it will be constituted under this bill. When we speak of waste in the country, of course, so far as this generation of people is concerned, it might be well stated that we will have all the timber that we will want, and therefore there ought to be no conservation in the forests of the country; that there will be all the coal that is necessary for several hundred years. Yet I desire to call your attention to the fact that in 1880, with the coal that was understood to be in sight in the United States, we had estimated enough to last the people in this country several thousand years, and this estimated supply has gone on down until the present time, when it is estimated, with the increased consumption, so far as the United States is concerned, it is practically known where all the coal is located. The area is pretty well defined, and it is estimated what the amount may be. And it is estimated now that with the increased consumption of coal, and with the gas, and with the oil that has been discovered, the use of water power, and all that, with the increase of population, the coal that is in sight will last possibly 200 years, or a little more.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Who has estimated that the coal of the United States could be consumed under any circumstances in 250 years?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the increased consumption of coal as we get the increased population of the country by those who have made the estimates.

Mr. MONDELL. That is, some one has assumed that if you admit a certain increase of use according to a geometrical ratio there will be consumed in a given length of time—in other words, if we consume enough coal in 250 years to consume all the coal there is in the country, we would consume it all? That is all there is to it?

Mr. FOSTER. Of course nobody could speak definitely of that, but we do know the increase of population that has occurred in the last 50 years, and know with that increased population there has been also increased consumption of coal per capita in the United States which has been very material.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want the gentleman to misunderstand me. I agree with the gentleman as to the propriety and advisability of conserving our fuel and not wasting it. But it does not seem necessary to raise any ghosts in that connection in order to bring the people to do it. The gentleman knows that in the State I have the honor to represent here, for instance, according to the reports of the Geological Survey there is a sufficient amount of coal to supply all of the people of the United States at the present rate of consumption for nearly 800 years.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, of course, those are estimates. The gentleman understands that nobody actually knows that for a fact. It is but an estimate of the amount of coal in the United States to-day and a calculation based on what it was 50 years ago and the increase of the consumption that has gone along, and the deduction is drawn that if the increased consumption continues in the future at the same rate it would consume possibly that coal.

Mr. MONDELL. I have heard that general statement made, and yet I have never known anyone to state the exact geometrical ratio of increase that would bring about in 250 years the consumption of the estimated amount of coal existing in the country.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the figures as to that, but I have the figures of the increased consumption of coal per capita which has occurred in the last 25 or 50 years.

Mr. MONDELL. We all agree that we should conserve our fuel, but it does not seem to me to be necessary to quote as a fact a statement or suggestion that unless we do differently from what we have been doing all our fuel will be exhaused in a short length of time.

Mr. FOSTER. I simply mention that as an estimate made by men who are dealing in these matters all the time and not a question of fact. Of course I do not know, and I do not think the gentleman from Wyoming could say that that is not so. When we speak about a great amount of coal, when we say that so many thousands of tons or millions of tons are under the ground, of course it is merely an estimate.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Yet if we have estimated 100,000,000 tons or 500,000,000 tons that are possibly under the ground, we must remember that in mining that coal under the present conditions there is a probability that only from 35 to 60 per cent is gotten out, and if we continue the present conditions and the present methods of mining that is all we will ever get out.

Mr. MONDELL. My suggestion is based on the present average amount of recovery—that with the present average of recovery and the present consumption the estimate is that in one of the States of the Union there is enough coal to supply all the population of the United States at the present rate of consumption for eight hundred and odd years. I think that is a very reasonable and conservative estimate. That is less than a tenth of all the coal on the public lands, without taking into consideration the coal held in private ownership. Of course, gentlemen may assume any rate of increase that pleases their fancy to assume, and by assuming a rate of increase high enough they can absorb the billions of tons of coal in the country within a comparatively brief period of time—in their imagination.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, it may be imagination, and the gentleman's statement with reference to the deposits in Wyoming may also be tinctured with imagination.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the estimate is a fairly conservative one.

Mr. FOSTER. But these matters are not always in accordance with the estimates. I think the gentleman from Wyoming will agree with me that possibly the area of coal, so far as it is controlled by the United States to-day, at least in continental United States, is pretty well understood.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true, and I think we ought not to waste it. But the amount that we understand that we have is so enormous that there is no necessity of anyone getting excited as to the danger of a coal famine.

Mr. FOSTER. Not in the gentleman's time, unless he should live to the age of Methuselah.

Mr. MONDELL. As to the gentleman's bill, I should not want to feel compelled to support it simply on the theory that if we did not enact it we would have a coal famine in a few years.

Mr. FOSTER. No; I was just mentioning the necessity for the conservation of the coal supply of the United States.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say that geology itself is not an exact science, and when you speak about the amount of coal in any State being sufficient to supply the needs of the country for 800 years at the present rate of consumption it is simply an estimate based upon the outlines or outcroppings of the geological formation and is not necessarily an accurate estimate. In other words, those who make those estimates have to draw on their imagination to just as great an extent as those who make the estimates of what the consumption will be in a given number of years, and it is simply on these two estimates, based upon such information as is available, that you arrive at your conclusion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that wherever estimates have been made by the Geological Survey with reference to the coal supply the supply has always overrun the estimate? Is there any instance known in history where an estimate has been made in advance of the amount of coal, and when mined it did not exceed the estimated amount?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that I could state that is a fact, and I think my colleague does not know it to be a fact.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois is not much of a historian.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do not think it is true generally. I know some instances where the estimates of the geologists have not been reached in actual operations.

Mr. MANN. That is in some particular mine.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In some particular field locally, where the amount of coal calculated to be present by the geologists has not been present when it came to actual operations of mining. That it is liable to variation is apparent. The same vein varies in thickness at different points, and if the different outcroppings show the vein to be thicker than the actual vein is in the body of the coal field, then the estimates will be larger than the actual amount of coal. If, on the other hand, the outcroppings show the vein to be thinner than it is actually in the body of the field, the estimates will be smaller than what is actually there.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, where the vein continues to outcrop for a considerable distance, the probability is that the outcropping is a good average indication of the average thickness of the vein.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is true, provided you are able to get a complete average throughout.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. But in making a survey based on the outcroppings, you are only able to locate the thickness of the vein at various points along the outcrop.

Mr. MONDELL. The outcrop is just as likely to be at a thin point as a thick, and just as likely to be at a thick as a thin point in the vein?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes. Sometimes the estimates based on the outcroppings show a larger amount of coal than actually exists, and it is very frequently the case—more generally than otherwise—that the blossom of coal is, on the average, of a greater thickness than the vein itself.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests that the estimates of the amount of coal now in the ground are no more likely to be accurate than the estimates of the future consumption of coal. I do not think the gentleman quite meant that, for the gentleman is an authority on these matters. The estimates of future consumption are the merest guesses in the world; they can not be otherwise, and the gentlemen whose business it is to keep us alarmed in regard to these matters—and I am not criticizing them, because it is perhaps well that we should be kept alarmed—have never been accused of lacking in imagination. On the contrary, referring again to my own State as a matter of illustration, there is no considerable difficulty in estimating, I think, with considerable accuracy the contents of our coal lands, because our coals generally outcrop on the surface over very considerable areas, and the crop lines run through the country often for miles, the deposits are generally reasonably continuous, and the locality of the coal deposit is well known.

In addition to that there are undoubtedly deposits that are not indicated by outcroppings at all, and as to those there is no estimate made. As to these veins which do crop there is no considerable difficulty in making a fairly accurate estimate as to the probable tonnage, and therefore these estimates of tonnage in a country like ours, where the veins are exposed in croppings, are in the main accurate, whereas the estimates of the future use are merely matters of imagination.

Furthermore, all these suggestions about the existence of coal fields is on the theory that we are never going to use anything for the production of heat and light and power but coal.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that within the last 10 years there has been developed a good deal of heat and light from water power, and we are using power other than of coal—that of gas and oil.

Mr. MONDELL. And we ought to use more.

Mr. FOSTER. And with all that increased use of other materials the consumption of coal has increased very materially.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true.

Mr. FOSTER. Another thing. When you come to estimate the amount of coal in Wyoming, which is very large, if you estimate 500,000,000,000 or whatever number of tons it may be in the ground in Wyoming, we know that to get the coal out under present conditions it probably means only 35 or 50 per cent of the amount.

Mr. MONDELL. I think in stating the estimates of the tonnage they are based not on the actual estimate of coal in the ground but on the estimated amount on the recovery basis on present operations.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, the gentleman will understand that I do not mean to give the gentleman these figures as facts, but to use the expression, "It is stated that such is the case." I do not know that as a matter of conserving the coal of the country it is a matter of importance, and there may be all that is necessary for all time to come, but we have seen our timber fast disappear, and one time it was thought there was no end to the supply.

There is another matter that might prolong that, I will say to the gentleman, and that is that now, under the present conditions, we get from 10 to 14 per cent of heat units out of a ton of coal, but with an improved way of burning that coal we might increase that very materially, which would save the coal of the world.

Mr. MONDELL. Ah, now the gentleman is discussing a very practical and very useful sort of conservation, which this bureau is endeavoring to inaugurate and encourage.

Mr. FOSTER. That is one of the problems of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not intend to break in on the gentleman's very interesting discourse——

Mr. FOSTER. That is all right; I am pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). Further than to say that I want to assist in the passage of the bill. I do not care to have my support of the bill based on the assumption that we are facing a coal famine and that we must do it in order to save ourselves from freezing to death.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad that my genial friend from Wyoming can find plenty of other reasons for his support of the bill.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. For a proper understanding of the gentleman's bill it does not make any material difference as far as the purpose of the bill is concerned whether the supply of coal will last 250 years or 1,000 years; this bill is intended for other purposes?

Mr. FOSTER. It is. It is intended to find out a more economical use of coal and all matters connected with the mining industry.

Mr. POWERS. For the purpose of improving health conditions?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the principal object, and should continue to be so.

Mr. POWERS. The thing I would like to know is what real difference it makes between the bill as it stands and the law as it now is?

Mr. FOSTER. It makes changes in the language which makes more specific the things to be done, defines more clearly the objects than the present act, and it does add something more in reference to the metal and to the quarrying industry of the country.

Mr. POWERS. It broadens the present scope of the law?

Mr. FOSTER. It broadens the present scope of the law to some extent, changes the language of the old law so as to say clearly what is intended and adds new language to enlarge the powers of the bureau, and it puts in one place a provision that was placed in the sundry civil bill of last year.

Mr. POWERS. Does it make any additional alterations so far as the coal-mining industry is concerned?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I think that is very much the same.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. MILLER. I do not know whether the question is proper at this point or not, as I have not been here all the time. I had occasion to make use of certain publications from the Bureau of Mines last year. To my mind they are among the most valuable documents that the Government is issuing, not even excepting the farmers' bulletin. I find that they are handicapped by not having sufficient funds to pay for printing the bulletins. At times they have been seriously handicapped and have been obliged to decline requests for a large number of publications. Has the gentleman provided in this bill any additional means for publication?

Mr. FOSTER. This bill could not do that.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman from Minnesota mean by being required to decline to furnish bulletins? Of course these are always obtainable from the superintendent of documents.

Mr. MILLER. But they were not published.

Mr. MANN. They will publish them if you ask for them.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, you can buy them, of course. But while we are sending out publications gratuitously that will do no one on the face of the earth or under the earth or above it any good, when we do get a valuable publication we ought to make it available to the people who can use it and who need it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is correct and we are sending out publications on a thousand and one subjects which do nobody any good, the first thing we ought to do is to stop and find out what they are and then stop them. I dare say the gentleman can not name any.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman is not going to take the trouble, but I think there would be a consensus of opinion that my statement is correct.

Mr. MANN. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman will realize that there are a great many bulletins which are published which would be of no service to the people whom he represents or to the people whom I represent, but in another part of the country they are of a good deal of benefit. Under our way of assigning bulletins to Members, however, the gentleman and myself and other Members get bulletins that are of no value to us at all, although they are of value to some people especially interested in the subject upon which they are published. I would say that in this bill we could hardly provide any means of printing bulletins, because that is a matter that would properly come under the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that the actual expense required for paying the cost of the publication would come in another bill, but I was wondering whether this bill could not contain phraseology authorizing the publication of certain bulletins.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not know the Superintendent of Mines, Mr. Holmes, or he would know that a thing of that sort would not be left out of any bill that Mr. Holmes prepared.

Mr. MILLER. I have had a good many talks with Mr. Holmes.

Mr. DALZELL. It is mandatory. It says:

That the director of the bureau shall prepare, publish, and distribute, subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, under the appropriations made from time to time by Congress, reports of inquiries and investigations—

And so forth.

Mr. MANN. And in section 2 it says that it shall disseminate information in such manner, and so forth.

Mr. MILLER. It does not designate the investigations to be made or the kinds of publications that may be published. It gives him authority in a general way to do this class of work.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, it is impossible to comprehend how any broader authority could be conferred in that respect. As I said before, paying a tribute to Mr. Holmes, in the first place the bill contains a provision that they may disseminate information concerning these subjects—all the subjects that are embraced in the bill—in such manner as will best carry out the purposes of the act; and having done that, then they specifically require the publication of bulletins on all the subjects mentioned in the act.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say to my colleague this: There has been some question as to whether or not the use of the term "dissemination of knowledge" would permit of the use of funds for the purpose of instructing miners in the mining centers of the country—as to whether a really strict construction of that law would permit them to do that.

Mr. MANN. But it authorizes them to publish bulletins, and that is what we are talking about.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but the gentleman was speaking about the first provision mentioned, namely, the dissemination of knowledge.

Mr. MANN. I know what they want is to have authority to go along and conduct schools wherever they please at public expense.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no. This work is only temporary.

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly. That is provided for in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken. What they do now, and all they expect to do, is, when they take these mine-rescue cars and go into the mining centers, where they get several hundred miners together, that they may be able to teach those miners the means of first-aid work, and what to do to make their condition safer in the mines. That is the only object of it. This work is only for starting the instruction, and it will then be carried on by the miners and operators.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I supported the bill two years ago providing for a bureau of mines and mining. It has been in operation now a little less than two years. It is not usual after creating a bureau to undertake to change the organic law for its creation within a year or two. It certainly ought not to be done without giving some reason for it. I have listened to every word that has been spoken by my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], who is very eloquent, but up to the present time I have not heard him say a word as to why the existing law is not sufficient and why he needs a new law which repeals the existing law and enacts a new law. It being a very unusual thing for Congress to create something one year and then entirely remodel it the next year, there ought to be some reason given for it. I have no doubt that there may be a very good reason, but I think it ought to be shown in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state to my colleague that we have incorporated in the bill a provision put in last year's sundry civil act, which is now the law, but we put it into this bill. Then, as I have said before, we have enlarged the scope of the bill to apply to other mining industries and have more clearly defined the objects of the original act.

Mr. MANN. Of course that can not be the purpose of this bill—to stick in something that is already the law. What is the purpose of this bill? Can anybody explain it except Mr. Holmes? He can not come on the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will wait a minute I will do the best I can to explain to him the proposed changes in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have been waiting patiently and will continue to wait with interest.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state that the gentleman talks about Mr. Holmes——

Mr. MANN. I have not said anything derogatory of Mr. Holmes.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; but the gentleman's phrase, I take it, is not particularly favorable to the gentleman who occupies the position of the Director of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. MANN. I do not know anybody who is his equal.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose he should die?

Mr. MANN. Then, this bill would have died if he had died.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose he had "passed in his checks," had died, what would have become of the bill?

Mr. SABATH. What does the gentleman mean by "passed in his checks"?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, my dear colleague knows. [Laughter.]

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. KOPP. I notice that the present law provides among other things that the duty of the bureau shall be to make diligent investigation of the methods of mining, with an idea to the improvement of conditions under which mining operations are carried on, the treatment of ores and other mineral substances. Has this bureau conducted any investigations along any of the lines I have indicated in any mines other than coal mines?

Mr. FOSTER. I think very little.

Mr. KOPP. Why is it that they have been giving their "special" attention exclusively to coal mines when there are lead and zinc mines in Missouri, Oklahoma, Wisconsin, and many other States in which thousands of men are employed, where accidents are not perhaps so frequent as in coal mines but where hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested the same as in coal mines? Why is it their investigations have been conducted mostly in regard to coal mines?

Mr. FOSTER. When this bureau was first established it was the understanding of Congress and I think the understanding of the Secretary of the Interior and officials of the Bureau of Mines that their special duty was at that time to look particularly after the safety of the miners, so they have given more attention to that feature of the work than to any other. Then, of course, all the appropriations they have had have been used in that way. This Bureau of Mines, as you will understand, makes all the tests of the coal of the Government, some fourteen thousand a year now, and that has required all the money they have had, and it has been a question how far they can go so far as the examination of metal mines is concerned.

Mr. KOPP. Then the fact is they have never exercised the jurisdiction they have to make investigations of the methods of mining and the improvement of conditions under which mining operations are carried on other than so far as life is concerned, and in regard to the treatment of ores and other mineral substances they have made no investigation along those lines?

Mr. FOSTER. Very little.

Mr. KOPP. And the only reason has been they——

Mr. FOSTER. Well, it is a question of whether they have a right to go into that feature of the work.

Mr. KOPP. I am reading from the present law; it seems then it is useless to add to it.

Mr. FOSTER. They have not had sufficient funds to do that in the first place if they had all this authority.

Mr. KOPP. Is there any question about the authority they have, in the gentleman's judgment?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether there is or not, but it has been thought there ought to be no doubt as to the right to do so.

Mr. KOPP. Does the gentleman seek to enlarge that authority in the present bill?

Mr. FOSTER. That is what we want to do.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit, I think I can possibly answer that question. I am a member of this committee, and that is really one of the principal objects of this bill, because now the Appropriations Committee and the Attorney General's Office and others have determined that the present law is not broad enough to take in an investigation of the zinc and lead mining industries and the metalliferous mining industries of the country, and if it is necessary to enlarge the law as it seems to be we should make this modification, giving the bureau that jurisdiction, and we hope hereafter to receive some recognition in the metal-mining industry of the country from this bureau.

Mr. KOPP. Is the gentleman from Colorado prepared to say what the Attorney General held in reference to metal mining?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I am not. If the gentleman will read the report of the Department of the Interior on that subject, I think it will virtually give you the idea—it is page 2 of the report—that the present law is hardly sufficiently broad to authorize the very object for which the bureau was created. That is one of the principal objects we are trying to accomplish.

Mr. SABATH. The chances are the investigations were not conducted in the zinc and lead mining industries because of the fact that most of the lead and zinc mines are in Democratic States, like Missouri, Kentucky, and Colorado and other States where the State legislatures have protected the miners better than in any of the other States. Is not that perhaps one of the reasons?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I would not think so; my colleague is hardly justified in thinking that way.

Mr. SABATH. I was under the impression that one of the reasons that those mines did not need to be investigated was because the laws of those States protected all the miners better than in the rest of the States.

Mr. BOWMAN. Not to the degree that the State of Pennsylvania does.

Mr. POWERS. Not any great protection in the State of Kentucky, I am sorry to say.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that we have changed the name from the Bureau of Mines to the United States Bureau of Mines simply as a distinction between the State bureaus and the United States bureau.

Mr. MANN. Of course that raises a very interesting proposition. Does the gentleman know of any other branch of the service that is named that way?

Mr. FOSTER. We now have the United States Geological Survey and the National Bureau of Standards.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman expect that we start in and call every bureau of the Federal service United States bureau so and so?

Mr. FOSTER. There can be no question about a United States Bureau of Mines in contradistinction with the State bureau of mines.

Mr. MANN. There is not now. All the bureaus of the Government that have a title usually put after the title, "Bureau of the United States," but this requires the name to be a part of the title, and that is not common and certainly ought not to become common.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the only reason it is put in, to make a distinction between Federal and State bureaus.

Mr. MANN. We have a Bureau of Chemistry, a United States Bureau of Chemistry, and we have 40 bureaus here in Washington, or more.

Mr. FOSTER. As I say, it is simply to make that distinction and, as far as I am concerned, I do not know that it makes much difference, except it does show the distinction.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing to prevent this bureau calling itself a Bureau of Mines and adding on of the United States. We might as well say House of Representatives, as there are houses of representatives in every State in the Union; then why should not we say United States House of Representatives?

Mr. KOPP. Be that as it may, I also call attention to the fact in the first section it is referred to as the United States Bureau of Mines, while in sections 2 and 4 and everywhere else it is referred to simply by the old name of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. FOSTER. We simply used United States Bureau of Mines in the first section to give the bureau that name.

Mr. KOPP. If that is the complete name, does not the gentleman think it ought to be used all the way through the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I hardly think so.

Mr. KOPP. They might think it is the bureau of mines of some State in sections 2, 3, and 4, as the gentleman suggested. They would have reason to think two different bureaus were being referred to if you put in section 1 the United States Bureau of Mines and subsequently a Bureau of Mines. According to the reason that the gentleman has given, it might be said that some other bureau was being referred to, and it seems to me he ought to use the same name in each section.

Mr. FOSTER. Possibly so, but I do not think it necessary.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think we should fix a United States Bureau of Mines in the United States Department of the Interior?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I should think not. The gentleman, I take it, is not serious in his criticism.

Mr. MANN. But they have departments of the interior in other places.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman may be right. I agree with the gentleman that that will not be necessary. I think the gentleman is possibly too hypercritical on that subject.

Mr. MANN. I maintain that we shall not undertake to change the bureaus in Washington. If we do it in one case, we shall have to do it in others.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that is the only reason we put it in, that there might arise some misunderstanding as to the name "Bureau of Mines," on account of the States having established bureaus of mines.

Mr. MANN. I think these bureaus would be usually referred to as "Bureaus of Mines of the United States."

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion? As the object is to clearly differentiate this bureau from the State bureaus, would it not be proper to use the word "Federal," if any distinction is necessary? We have what is known as a "National Reclamation Service," and the word is used when there is any necessity of distinguishing it from State bureaus. If there is any necessity of using a distinctive word, it seems to me the word "national" would be the proper one, or the word "Federal," if the word "national" is not used.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the only reason that distinction was put in there.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I have been advertised as being one with other wicked men who have been against this service, and if the gentleman will allow me to state, I have never had anything to do directly or indirectly touching the opposition or the establishment of the Bureau of Mines. At the time it was established I was Speaker of the House and quite busy with the general duties that pertain to that position. Now, we have a great deal of public service touching public health. We have the Marine-Hospital Service and we have the Army and Navy Medical Service that make investigations through these various legally organized instrumentalities touching health. We have also a Geological Survey in the Department of the Interior. We have a Bureau of Standards under the Department of Commerce and Labor. We have a Mining Bureau. Let me say that I have a slight acquaintance with the director of that bureau, and I have rarely met a man who, in my judgment, is so efficient along the line of public service as he is. [Applause.] I have met others, and there will be others, when he and I and you are dead and gone, equally competent. So I make this remark as a basis for asking two or three questions. In a hasty reading of the bill, it seems to me that it authorizes largely a duplication of the work done by the Geological Bureau. It seems to me to duplicate the work done by the Bureau of Standards. Now, my colleague is not in favor, I feel quite sure from what I know of him, of duplicating work. For instance, in section 2, amongst other things, commencing with line 11, down to and including line 24—

Subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, this bureau is authorized to conduct inquiries and scientific and technologic investigations concerning mining—

That authority already exists, as I understand it—and the preparation, treatment, and utilization of mineral substances—

That is, all mineral substances. Perhaps there is no authority to go beyond coal mining under the present law. But now mark the words—with a view to improving health conditions and increasing safety—

Now, all of us are in favor of health and in favor of safety. Further—efficiency, economic development—

You see these are pretty general terms and cover the whole field practically so far. And there is still more to follow—and the prevention of waste in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, and other mineral industries.

That is pretty broad. Waste? That would authorize chemical laboratories. It would authorize the employment of experts. Further:

To investigate explosives and fuels and unfinished mineral products belonging to, or for the use of, the United States, with a view to their most efficient use.

That is already being done by the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state to my colleague the work of this bureau is confined to the unfinished products.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to complete my statement?

Mr. FOSTER. Surely.

Mr. CANNON. Because I am doing it in good faith.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. And it says:

And to disseminate information concerning these subjects in such manner—

And so forth. And then when you go to section 3 we have, in substance, the same thing, and part of section 3, I think, is already covered by the present law. Then, again, in section 4, touching health, touching all the metal industries, and so forth, it says:

Provided, That nothing herein——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman's time ought to be extended to such time as he may desire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my colleague be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN, asks that his colleague, Mr. FOSTER, be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to amend that suggestion by giving the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] an additional hour, if he needs it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not need it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then I withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CANNON. There are those things in general terms that would authorize investigations—I was going to say in the legal world, but certainly in the medical world and the surgical world—and touching the waste in all mineral industries.

In fact, it is broad enough, it seems to me, to cover pretty much everything in the industries, including all mineral industries, quarrying, and everything else, and health generally. And then comes this proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the employment by the Bureau of Mines, in a consulting capacity or in the temporary investigation of special subjects, of any engineer or other expert whose principal professional practice is outside of such employment by said bureau.

Now, in my judgment, with the broad authority there given if this legislation is enacted, the bill ought to go further and repeal the law authorizing the Bureau of Standards, a great plant, running into the millions, to transfer everything connected with the Bureau of Standards from the Department of Commerce and Labor to the Department of the Interior, and it ought also to abolish the Geological Survey, and I am not sure but that, so far as it duplicates a general investigation touching health—because that covers the whole field—the activities concerning health covered by the Bureau of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service might also be transferred. We already duplicate in large part many of the matters that I have referred to, and this Bureau of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service in that respect is analogous, as I understand it, to the existing law touching the Bureau of Mines. It may be that it would be wise to do that. About that I have no opinion and do not express any prejudice. But it seems to me that in giving that additional authority we ought to consolidate the various services that are being duplicated by this measure.

Now, to set everybody's mind at rest, I do not make the remarks, somewhat extended, in the shape of a question, through the courtesy of my colleagues, in a criticizing spirit, but in the best of faith, for the benefit, if it be a benefit, of anybody touching the public service.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to say a few words in reply to my colleague. I want to say that I think my colleague has a wrong impression, a wrong idea, as to what the province of each of these bureaus are. I am sure that when he stops to think and consider concerning this bill he will see that there is not any duplication of work here. For instance, as to improving health conditions, I want to say that in the Bureau of Mines there is now detailed from the Bureau of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service an expert surgeon, who is examining into the health conditions in reference to mines. For instance, in some States it has been determined that the hookworm is contracted by people who work in the mines; it has been found that that condition exists in the mines; so that this surgeon, who is detailed to the Bureau of Mines to examine into those matters, is not employed by the Bureau of Mines, although he is working under its direction. He is cooperating with the mining engineers of the Bureau of Mines. He is studying health conditions and the mining engineer is endeavoring to determine what changes in the mining methods and operations can be made to improve these health conditions and make the mine safer.

Again, by section 2, for instance, inquiries and investigations are authorized concerning the utilization of mineral substances with a view to improving health conditions. That comma should be taken out between the words "health" and "conditions." These inquiries are designed to increase "the safety, efficiency, economic development, and the prevention of waste in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical industries; to investigate explosives and fuels and unfinished mineral products belonging to or for the use of the United States." As to this section it has been suggested by the Secretary of the Interior that an amendment should be placed after the word "States," in line 22, page 2, in somewhat this form: "With reference to the mining treatment, preparation, and use."

There might be some difficulty there, as suggested by my colleague, but the Secretary of the Interior has suggested in a letter to Senator POINDEXTER that that language ought to be placed there, so that there could be no question about it, in reference to the mining, preparation, and treatment, because it is not the duty of the Geological Survey to have anything to do with the mining of ore. They have nothing to do with that. The language placed there, in line 22, "with a view to the most efficient use," might be stricken out and these words inserted in lieu thereof: "In reference to their mining, treatment, and use." That would obviate any possibility of the language being construed so that it would duplicate any work already being done by the Geological Survey. That is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, and it was the intention, so far as I am concerned, to offer such an amendment. The language of this bill is satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Geological Survey and they do not believe there would be any duplication of work.

Now, as to improving health conditions, the Bureau of Mines does not employ physicians, and will not under this bill, except as I have stated to the gentleman from Illinois, but it is expected that the employment of such experts might result in showing how to keep out gases and instituting better methods of ventilation and keeping down the dust that arises in the quarries and in the quartz mines, which has proven to be so injurious to the men who work there. It is not the intention to go and look after the general health or physical condition of all miners, but only such conditions of ventilation, and so on, as will improve the health of the miners. It will develop facts and principles, but it will not examine all mines. It will only examine enough mines to develop the principles and suggest remedies. That is the intention, so far as I understand it. The committee has endeavored to so word the bill so as to avoid duplicating the work of the Bureau of Standards. This bill would not authorize the Bureau of Mines to investigate finished manufactured products nor structural materials, nor any of the work authorized by the Bureau of Standards. There is no provision that permits any such duplication.

Mr. CANNON. I am in exact harmony with that intention, but I submit again to the gentleman the suggestion that the language on lines 24 and 25 on page 3 and on lines 1 and 2 of page 4 is pretty sweeping.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state that I desire to hear whatever just criticism can be made of this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I am acting in the best of faith, and I think my colleague from Illinois is.

Mr. FOSTER. I want this bill enacted into law in the best shape possible, so this bureau may do still better work, and I think my colleague does, too. The proviso, beginning on line 23 of page 3, is:

That nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the employment by the Bureau of Mines, in a consulting capacity or in the temporary investigation of special subjects, of any engineer or other expert whose principal professional practice is outside of such employment by said bureau.

Now, it was thought that in the original act this could be done by the permission of the Secretary of the Interior; but the restrictions placed in this section would prevent the bureau from employing any temporary help or one who owns any interest in any mine even in a consulting capacity for only a limited time. I think it is desirable to have the right to employ such assistance for a little time, but, of course, I would not want to see any abuse of this provision any more than any other Member and do not think there would be.

The Comptroller of the Treasury and auditor have decided that under this provision of the law now they have a right to do that, but for fear that there might be some question arise some time, we thought that there should be no doubt about it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Right there, did not this Congress within the last three years expressly prohibit the employment of such experts because of the abuse that grew out of it, and has it not been the policy of the Government that men that work for it should work for it alone and not pay special fees to men whose work was nine-tenths in some other business? The result of such employment was that the expert used his position to start a backfire on Members of Congress. You got hold of a professor in the State college who received a salary of $3,000 or $4,000 for doing work for the State college, and then he was called in in a consulting capacity and paid a few thousand dollars extra, and incidentally his whole influence was used to build a backfire. That practice was exposed on this floor.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with the gentleman that there ought not to be any abuse of such a provision.

Mr. SHERLEY. But you are expressly providing for it here.

Mr. FOSTER. I know we are providing for the employment of temporary experts, but I want to tell the gentleman why we provide for it, so that I may conclude what I have to say on this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I not only want the gentleman to conclude, but I am willing to provide that he must conclude. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of confusion in the House, and I have not been able to get the full force of everything that has been said on this subject in the colloquy over there that has been going on between the gentlemen now discussing it.

Mr. CANNON. Might not Mahomet come a little nearer to the mountain? There are lots of seats here. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentlemen from Illinois all seem to have heard each other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels constrained to state that the gentleman from Kansas has caused the only disturbance that has come to the ear of the Chair since this debate began.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That means, I suppose, that what I have said is all that the Chair has been able to hear. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair means to say that the gentleman has made the only noise that has been made in the Chamber since the debate began.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, in the work of the Bureau of Mines it has been necessary sometimes to do some special work and to employ some outside help. For instance, there might be in Pennsylvania or West Virginia or Illinois some serious accident which they would want to specially investigate. There might not be in the department such a man who could go out and do that special work at that particular time. Now, the object was, and it has been held by the comptroller, that the Bureau of Mines might employ experts outside of the regular employees of the bureau—some one to do that special work. The committee has proposed to place an amendment in the bill making the compensation of this person not to exceed $10 per day. It is sometimes necessary to do that, and it has been done, especially in a new bureau like this, where it is more than necessary for the best interest of the work and for economical reasons.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, that was the device used for this particular extra compensation. The per diem was fixed, but the number of days was determined by the bureau employing the man, and there was not any way by which you could say how much work was done on these different days, and it simply resulted in giving some man who was doing nine-tenths of his work for some educational institution an opportunity for outside compensation, and, incidentally, enlisting him in the activities of the bureau. It developed in that case that correspondence went not only to Members of the House but to various other people, with the object of creating further activity in the department. It is a natural thing for a man that feeds on a bureau to see to it that that bureau is kept going.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the only object of this section is, as I have said, to make it possible that the Bureau of Mines for a little time might be able to employ some outside help, and I hardly think, with the limitation, it will be abused.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not questioning the object, but pointing out the possible abuse.

Mr. FOSTER. They may want at times a special man for a special purpose, and I think the gentleman from Kentucky is unduly alarmed.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In reference to that proviso, would that authorize the employment of these experts in the District of Columbia where the law otherwise provides that they can not be employed in the District unless specifically appropriated for? The gentleman will remember that we carried in the legislative bill the other day a provision which would render a man subject to fine and imprisonment and removal from office if he made a mistake in reference to the construction of a provision like this. I think it would be fair, therefore, if the gentleman in charge of the bill would express his opinion as to whether this does authorize the employment in the District of Columbia of one of these experts.

Mr. FOSTER. In view of that provision placed in the bill, I do not think that without the special appropriation it can be done.

Mr. MANN. This says that nothing shall be construed as preventing the employment by the Bureau of Mines. Does the engineer who is employed have to remain outside the District or can he come inside?

Mr. FOSTER. Under that provision of law I do not think he could, and, further than that, the Bureau of Mines investigates or tests coal for the Government. I think with this provision of the law that was placed in the legislative bill the Bureau of Mines, without special appropriation, will be unable to employ men in that work in the District.

Mr. SHERLEY. But there is an express provision that authorizes that.

Mr. MANN. That law is many years old. The legislative bill only fixed the penalty. As a matter of fact, has not the Bureau of Mines employed experts in the District of Columbia already out of the lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that it has.

Mr. CULLOP. There is nothing in this bill that says anything about employing men outside of the District of Columbia. All this provides is that it shall not be a person connected with the bureau. The place of residence of the person is not fixed by the provisions of the act.

Mr. MANN. But there is a law that prohibits the employment of any person in the District of Columbia unless an appropriation specifically authorizes it. That does not mean that the appropriation has to name that person. It may be for something that requires employment in the District. We carried a provision in the legislative bill the other day requiring the officer in charge of an appropriation to determine at his risk—the risk of removal from office and of fine and imprisonment—to determine whether the appropriation authorized it or not. Now, does this act change the existing law and authorize employment in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CULLOP. With all due respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois on the proposition to which he refers, I do not think it could ever be construed in such a drastic way as the gentleman has construed it.

Mr. MANN. I am afraid that the gentleman has not read it.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; I have read it, but it could not be construed as broadly as the construction the gentleman has placed upon it.

Mr. MANN. The provision in the legislative bill the other day did not require construction. It plainly provided for removal from office, fine, and imprisonment.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but that would require it to have been carelessness, or a willful mistake. An honest mistake would not be visited with such a penalty as that.

Mr. MANN. That is not the opinion of the Department of Justice.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If this should be enacted into law, it becomes the latest law. You herein expressly provide, just as if you had written into it "any previous law to the contrary notwithstanding," that nothing shall be construed to prevent the Bureau of Mines from employing anybody not in the regular employment of the bureau to do special work. There is no provision limiting the employment as to person or to place, but provided that the man be employed for the purpose of special investigations, then he may conduct them, not only in the District of Columbia, but in the Directors Office of the Bureau of Mines in the District of Columbia, if need be, and you have made it just as wide as it is possible to make it by the use of the English language, in my judgment.

Mr. FOSTER. The only intention of this provision is that it would enable the Bureau of Mines at those special times when it may be necessary to employ an expert not connected with the bureau and this is only general and the special provision would apply.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not questioning the good faith of the committee, or even of the bureau, in suggesting this, but I am calling to the attention of this Committee of the Whole the experiences that this House has had where Congress has heretofore on the same assumption that a thing would not be abused, given such powers, and after a few years it has developed that a particular bureau was abusing the power thus given to feed a lot of people out of the Government Treasury, who really belonged to other organizations.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sure I am just as strictly opposed to anything of that kind as the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand the gentleman is opposed to it, but opposition is of no value unless it is accompanied with a desire to restrict legislation so that the abuse can not take place.

Mr. FOSTER. But I want to say that it is absolutely necessary as a matter of economy to the Government that the Bureau of Mines be able to do this for a time. Whether such a thing would be abused is another question. I do not know and neither does the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I should hesitate to differ with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], but it seems to me that his construction of this language is not correct. The general statute to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] referred is the statute preventing the temporary employment of experts while, say, within the District of Columbia. This language authorizes the employment of experts in a consulting capacity or in a temporary way generally without specifying where they may be employed. Therefore, I think the construction of this language in connection with the existing statute would be this, that it would not in terms or by implication repeal the existing statute, but would be construed in connection with it and authorize the employment of experts outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself, I am just as much opposed to employing them outside as I am here. I think it is a bad, vicious system. I believe we ought to have men working for the Government only. They ought to have no divided allegiance. No man can serve two masters. It has been abused in the past, and in the future it will be the means for giving certain favors to a few people under the guise of getting special work done, and thereby getting certain local influences scattered over the country to work to build up a sentiment in regard to a particular kind of work. That has been its history in the past, and I believe will be its history in the future.

Mr. SMALL. That is a difference between the gentleman from Kentucky and the chairman of the committee as to the merits of the proposition. I understood that the committee had concluded it was important to permit the employment of experts in accordance with the provisions here. The gentleman from Kentucky thinks that it is an unwise provision. So far as the difference upon the merits is concerned, I would be inclined to follow the committee that had investigated the matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, it ought not to be lese majesty to differ with the committee, and, in the second place, the gentleman from Kentucky is not speaking altogether ill advisedly. I suspect that we have had as full, and certainly more recent, hearings from the Director of the Bureau of Mines before the sundry civil subcommittee than was had upon this bill.

Mr. SMALL. The thought I was addressing myself to particularly was the question of the construction of this statute which has been brought before this House, and, as I assume to say, I think the proper construction of this language in connection with the existing law would not in terms or by implication repeal the existing law, but this would be construed in connection with existing law and permit the employment of experts in the District of Columbia as the existing law provides.

Mr. CULLOP. Just on that point I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky, because I am somewhat with his contention, why could not we limit it by some amendment which would avoid the very difficulty here and which might arise again under the provisions of this bill, such as the location of persons, designating a certain territory from which such person might be selected if one was required, and the conditions under which he should be called. For instance, if it were out in your territory—you have large mining interests there—some person could be designated from the agricultural college of that State; or if in Indiana, some person from the agricultural college of that State; or in Pennsylvania, some one from there; and by that means the very difficulty that the gentleman from Kentucky has spoken of might not occur in the administration of this measure.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman may be right about that. For instance, if an accident occurred in a certain part of the country, if a man could be selected who is doing special work there, it will find it much more economical for the Government to employ an expert that is acquainted with a given mine or with certain conditions, and he can do that work possibly in two or three days, than to have one of these experts kept continually in office. Now, usually these mining engineers who do this special work are not anxious to do it for $10 a day.

Mr. RAKER. As I understand the suggestion made by the gentleman from Kentucky, his principal objection is as to the policy of permitting anyone outside the bureau to be employed. He is not discussing, as I understand it, whether or not this could not be provided for, because it can be very easily and readily provided for by making an exception, except in the District of Columbia. I understand the opposition is to the policy of permitting any employees outside of those belonging to the bureau.

Mr. HOWELL. It seems to me that in this discussion there is one thing that has been overlooked, and that is there should be some modification of the language immediately preceding it:

> Nor shall the director or any member of said bureau have any personal or private interest in any mine or the products of any mine under investigation.

Now, in some cases it may be necessary to employ a man who is interested in a mine. He may be the very person who ought to be employed and who knows more about the conditions of the mine than anybody else, and this provision imposes a limitation upon the employment by the Bureau of Mines of anyone having an interest of that kind. The purpose of the modification merely is to permit the Bureau of Mines under some conditions to employ a person who might have an interest in a mine in some locality.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think we ought to employ a man who has an interest in a mine to make an investigation of that mine?

Mr. HOWELL. It might be necessary in some localities to employ an expert who has some interest, some stock or something of that kind, but he would be a man who understood the character of the mine and have such information that he would be the best man for the purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not that they should employ some expert to examine a mine, but the provision is that no person who is employed by the Bureau of Mines shall own any stock of any kind or have any interest in any mine. Now, the intention of the provision is, for instance, one mining engineer might own stock, say, in a mine over in Pennsylvania, and if there was not some provision of that kind you could not employ him to work in the State of Alabama. This will simply give the right to employ an engineer who owned some stock in Pennsylvania to do some work, for instance, in the State of Alabama.

Mr. HOBSON. If the gentleman will read very carefully, it says:

> Nor shall the director nor any member of said bureau have any personal or private interest in any mine or the products of any mine under investigation.

The expert temporarily employed would not, in my judgment, come under the definition provided here as a member of the bureau. He would be employed by the bureau temporarily, and he would not be prohibited under those words, in my judgment; and I do not see the obstacle suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. HOWELL. The proviso is intended to guard that, that no person in the employ of the bureau might be construed to be a member of the bureau.

Mr. HOBSON. I should not think so. I should not think a person employed should be a member, otherwise many of our bureaus here would have thousands and hundreds of thousands of members.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the law as construed means only those who are regularly employed by the bureau.

Mr. HOBSON. Designated in the appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. Those only are members of the bureau.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not think the gentleman's objection is good.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question? We have now something in the nature of a Bureau of Mines and Mining, I believe. Will the gentleman advise me as to whether in the past the agents of the bureau have investigated gas explosions that have occurred in the different States; and, if so, have they, as a result of their investigations, assigned the responsibility and the cause of those accidents?

Mr. FOSTER. I will yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania to answer that question, who has better knowledge on that particular subject on account of his large practical experience as a miner.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that the bureau has investigated the conditions existing in mines after explosions have occurred, but they have never undertaken to place the responsibility of those explosions, the bureau assuming that that was a duty devolving upon the States and not upon the Federal Government; that their duty was to find out, so far as they could, the cause of the explosion so that they might devise methods of prevention, and that it was not their duty to place the responsibility for the explosion. I may say further, that in making investigations toward that end that there has been developed a different line of thought regarding the prevention of explosions, and prevention is very much more important even than this rescue-car service that the gentleman from Illinois has referred to. One of those methods which have been experimented with and found to be of considerable value in preventing explosions of fire damp has been the turning of steam jets from the plants at the mine into the intake of the ventilating current, so that there is a greater amount of moisture going into the mine than would normally go in if these steam jets were not there. That moisture continually going into the mine ultimately permeates the dust so that it does not rise as rapidly when the explosion takes place and does not ignite as rapidly when it is raised. The other method which has been developed, and which can be utilized where no steam jets are in existence, is to crush the shales and clays which are found where the coal measures exist into fine powder and distribute that over airways, traveling ways, and working places where it accumulates.

The dust being noninflammable and being heavier than coal dust—that is, the shale dust being less inflammable and heavier than coal dust—reduces the inflammability of the coal dust so that there is less likelihood of the ignition of coal dust from the blown-out shot or from a pocket of fire damp. Those are some of the things that have already been developed by the Bureau of Mines along the line of preventing accidents in mining. But the bureau has not yet undertaken, nor is it within the power of the bureau to undertake, to place the responsibility for any accident that has taken place. Their policy is to find out the causes and develop the means of prevention.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, may I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], through his courtesy, this further question: It is a matter, of course, of common information that conditions in Europe with reference to gas are more aggravated, and have been for the last generation, than here, and yet the number of accidents by way of explosion has been less there in recent years. Has the bureau collected information sufficient in reference to that matter in other countries for utilization here?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. To a limited extent only, because that is one of the things for which a sufficient amount of funds has not been provided. They have gathered some information relative to accidents abroad, but the Geological Survey has done more in that direction than the Bureau of Mines has done in the collecting of information relative to the accidents that have occurred, and the Geological Survey has from time to time reported upon the accidents occurring abroad and the accidents occurring in the United States. They have furnished considerable of statistics on that subject.

Mr. LEWIS. Have they furnished the mining regulations with reference to accidents where gas exists?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. They have not collated much of the information as to regulations to prevent accidents.

Mr. BOWMAN. The State of Pennsylvania has already furnished a great deal of information as to what has been done in foreign countries as to the prevention of these accidents.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would say that I am greatly interested in this matter of the prevention of the danger in coal mines, and I would like to ask as to the probable effect of the introduction of shale dust or steam through jets on the conditions of life in the normal working of the mines, which conditions leave a great deal to be desired.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That has been taken into consideration, but the practical effects have not as yet been demonstrated. There is a great deal of moisture in the atmosphere, it is true, that is absorbed gradually as the air passes into the workings, so that when it goes into the point in which the workmen are actually at work there is not much more than the normal amount of moisture in the air. Under the normal conditions of the current of air going into the mine, the absorption of the moisture from the air by the roof, the ribs, and the floor of the workings makes the air dry at the working place, so that there is not much danger to health from increased moisture.

So far as the shale dust is concerned, it is sprinkled in the traveling ways, the airways, and the working place at the time when the workmen are not at work, and the only time when that shale dust would be distributed and come into contact with the breathing of the workmen would be in the event of an explosion, and in that event the very fact that this dust is mixed with the coal has reduced the possibilities of danger from the explosion or the spread of the explosion. So there is not much chance of injury to the workmen through the spreading of fine shale dust through the workings.

Mr. FOWLER. If I understand you, the shale dust, in doing this, prevents the explosion of the coal dust?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, your injection of the steam has the effect to prevent the explosion of the coal dust. Does it also have the effect to prevent the explosion of gases?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. FOWLER. I did not think it did. That was the reason I was asking.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The matter of handling gases and how to make them nondangerous was known long before the Bureau of Mines came into existence. The best method of handling fire damp is to furnish a sufficient amount of air to dilute the fire damp to such a point that it will no longer explode. Fire damp is more explosive at the points where there are 5 parts of air to 1 of gas up to that of 14 parts of air to 1 of gas, than any other condition under which gas exists. Now, if you furnish a sufficient amount of air in the ventilating current to reduce the amount of gas to a ratio of less than 14 to 1, then you have destroyed the danger of explosion from gas or fire damp in mines. That was known before the Bureau of Mines came into existence, and these other means that have been developed and worked out by the Bureau of Mines are means of dealing with explosions of coal dust, which frequently intensify gas explosion.

Mr. FOWLER. That is true as to gas explosions. Has any modern method been discovered to prevent the explosion, other than the air current, for the purpose of reducing the ratio above 14 to 1?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. FOWLER. Or a sufficient air current to drive out the gas?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. FOWLER. And so the Bureau of Mines in other countries have not made much improvement on that question?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. On that point, neither in this country nor any other country where the subject has been investigated, has there been any other method devised of dealing with fire damp as such, than by furnishing sufficient air to try to drive it out, as I have stated.

Mr. FOWLER. But you have made some progress in the way of saving life by the introduction of instruments, have you not, in the case of fire damp or explosions?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Methods have been developed by which oxygen can be supplied to the helmets of workmen, so that they can pass through the dangerous gases, and by that means enable them to reach those who have been overcome by the gases.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman seems to be well equipped with information on the subject, and I would like to ask him if these instruments have been put into general use in any of the States.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no law in any of the States requiring any of the coal corporations to furnish them, but as the result of the rescue cars having been sent to the different mining States by the Bureau of Mines and carrying with them this class of equipment and giving instructions to the workmen in various localities, there are a number of large corporations that have put in this apparatus at their own expense and who maintain a force of workmen who are continually training with the rescue apparatus. There are some in almost all the mining States of the Union.

Mr. FOWLER. About how far could a man travel with one of these instruments after the fire damp had pervaded the mine?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. About an hour or an hour and a half, or two hours of travel at the outside.

Mr. FOWLER. What are these instruments charged with, oxygen?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Potash and oxygen, in order to generate the breathing material for the workmen. That is carried in compressed form on the back of the workman.

Mr. FOSTER. Section 1 of this bill changes the name United States Bureau of Mining in contradistinction to State bureaus of mines, and it is stated that it is to be a bureau of mining, metallurgy, and mineral technology, as this expresses more clearly the functions of the bureau, showing that it deals with the mining of coal, ores, and also extends the jurisdiction to quarrying. It is important to know the best conditions to be put into operation in the mining of coal, ore, and quarrying of stone and slate. It is also important to understand the treatment of ore so as to be able to secure the largest amount of returns in this industry. The original act provided that the Secretary of the Interior should provide such employees as necessary to carry out the purpose of this act. This bill proposes that the Secretary of the Interior shall provide such experts and other employees as are necessary in accordance with the appropriation made by Congress. This is so guarded that Congress at all times has the power to control this matter, and the appointments of employees must be made in accordance with the appropriation which Congress sees fit to make.

In section 2 there has been more change made in the language from the original act, and it specifies and defines more clearly the province of the bureau and gives power to investigate in a scientific way the different problems connected with the mining industry. The first object to improve health conditions of those who work in the mines and to increase the safety of miners, which is certainly an important thing to do, in view of the great loss of life in the industry. It is not intended that this bureau would look after all the conditions of the health of the miners, but only so far as those conditions exist in mining and quarrying.

It is certainly important to have a more efficient way of mining and the best way to secure the greatest efficiency is desirable. The economic development of mining is one of the problems which needs study, and under the provisions of this bill now proposed they will be carefully considered as Congress shall make appropriations from time to time to carry on this work. There is no doubt of the great waste that is going on in many branches of the mining industry. It will be the province of this bureau to study the means of preventing this loss. The study of explosives used in mines concerns those who are employed in the industry, and this is one of the problems now being considered by this bureau. The investigation of all the phases of the mining and treatment of ore will be limited to the unfinished products belonging to and for the use of the United States, and it is especially provided that no private property shall be examined except for the health of miners, and then only by the permission of the Secretary of the Interior. Your committee believes that with this restriction there could be no work done for private parties. The knowledge thus gained by the bureau should be disseminated among those to whom it would be useful, and the bill provides not only for the issuance of bulletins, but also that in the mine-rescue work instructions may be given to miners in order to prevent accidents and save the loss of life. In section 3 this matter of the publication of bulletins is practically the same as under the original act.

The changes in the organic law have been asked for and urgently requested by the American Mining Congress, so that the scope of this bureau might be enlarged, and especially that the metal-mining interests of the West might be given some attention. And the changes in the original act have been proposed with a hope that the bureau might be able to render greater assistance to this industry and that in time this bureau might be to the great mining interests of the country what the Agricultural Department is to agriculture.

Your committee does not believe under this proposed bill there will be any duplication or competition in the work of this bureau and other branches of the Government.

The Geological Survey makes investigations as to the topography and geology of the country, and this work does not belong to the Bureau of Mines. On the other hand, there are a group of investigations which more properly belongs to the Bureau of Standards, Bureau of Labor, and Bureau of Health.

We believe that there has been laid a good basis for reasonable cooperation between the Bureau of Mines and these other branches of the Federal service and that there will be no duplication, but that all these bureaus will work in harmony for the public good as Congress may from time to time direct.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the district I represent is a mining district, and, of course, very naturally this proposed legislation interests and appeals to the people of that district. We are not only extensively engaged in coal-mining operations in four or five counties, employing from five to seven thousand people, but we are perhaps the largest producers of marble of any district in the South.

Then we have for a number of years been engaged in the zinc industry. Under the increased duties carried in the Payne-Aldrich bill the zinc industry has improved and grown. Then we are also interested in the mining of barytes and iron ore, and in a near-by district, sixty-odd miles away, the largest copper-mine operations in the Southern States have been conducted for many years, the early operations there even beginning prior to the Civil War.

It is remarkable, when we study and consider the fact that we have so many million dollars invested in mining operations all over the Republic and countless thousands of wage earners employed in the mining industry, to think that Congress never, until two years ago, realized the importance of legislating to the extent of passing a bill creating a Bureau of Mines and Mining.

We have been losing by mine accidents alone in coal operations an average of five or six human lives in this country to one in the mines of the old country, and that difference is all the more remarkable because the mines of Europe are more dangerous of operation than ours. This difference is explained by the fact that every old country engaged in mining operations is far in advance of the New World in the creation of facilities for protecting those engaged in the mining industries, so that when it came to the creation of the Bureau of Mines and Mining two years ago we largely drew our information and secured mine-rescue plans from the old countries, which had them in use for many years.

Both political parties in this country realized the importance of legislation along this line and both carried strong and specific declarations in their platforms in favor of a Bureau of Mines and Mining. So one of the best acts in the interest of the protection of property and human life enacted in the Sixty-first Congress was the bill reported to this House by the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, the late Col. Huff, of Pennsylvania, who passed away a few weeks ago. And I want to say that the wisdom of that legislation in creating this new bureau has been more than justified in the short period of that bureau's existence.

The President of the United States, Mr. Taft, has appointed many able and efficient men to public office. Though there was a long and a warm contest over the selection of the chief of this new bureau, the President did the right thing in selecting the present occupant of that office, Prof. Holmes. [Applause.] He was not only eminently qualified and equipped for this office, but in his brief administration of less than two years he has more than fully met the expectations of his numerous friends, scattered all over this country, and if there be a popular official in Washington, who carries the absolute confidence of the men that his bureau comes in contact with, it is Prof. Holmes. He has the confidence, the respect, the indorsement, and the backing not only of the mine operators of this country, but also of the men who work in the mines. [Applause.]

Now, this was a new law, and it is not surprising that in its administration there should be defects in it and the failure to come up to the full requirements of great mining industries, involving the investment of millions of dollars and the lives of thousands of working people. Hence, the present chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]—and a more conscientious, faithful Representative does not sit on either side of this Chamber [applause]—who has given this subject careful and conscientious consideration and study, brings in a bill here for the enlargement of the powers of this new bureau, backed up by every member of the majority and every member of the minority of the committee—a unanimous report. Then he has with it the unqualified indorsement of the Secretary of the Interior, and along with that comes the approval of the chief of this bureau, Prof. Holmes. I say that any proposition of this kind coming here with the unanimous indorsement of the committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, with the indorsement of the Bureau of Mines, and back of that the American Mining Congress, and, I assert, the indorsement of the mine operatives of this country from one end to the other, and the men who work in these mines, that we ought not to quibble or hesitate in the passage of this bill.

Let me give you a few instances that have come under my special notice in the operation of this bureau. We had a disaster in the district that I represent, in 1902, at the Fratersville mine, Briceville, Tenn., a disaster in which 184 men lost their lives; every one of them an American citizen, men of families, and every one who entered the mine on that morning lost his life. Among them were 15 or 20 boys. The majority of these miners were living at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and the explosion occurred at half past 7 in the morning. They left behind them messages to their families, written on pieces of slate, stating that they were still alive at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Had our Congress been progressive enough, active enough, ever awake to the interest of the miners of this country, we would have established many years ago a Bureau of Mines and Mining fully equipped to protect and care for the lives of these men imprisoned in the mines. Had we in 1902 what we have to-day we would have saved practically all of the men who gave up their lives in that mine, because with the oxygen helmets the trained men from the rescue station at Knoxville, established two years ago, could have entered that mine and saved the men and boys.

Now, we had a mine disaster in the same district within a few hundred yards of the original disaster, on December 9, 1911, where 84 men and boys lost their lives—83 native Americans and 1 foreigner.

The mine-rescue car stationed at Knoxville, Tenn., was absent in an adjoining mining district, where its men were giving instructions to miners in rescue work. Prof. Holmes was then in North Carolina. The car was hurried to this point, and Dr. Holmes joined his force and entered the mine and saved a number of these men that I later had the pleasure of talking with about their experience in this mine.

Two years ago we had a disaster in the copper mine at Ducktown, sixty-odd miles from Knoxville, where the miners were imprisoned. We used the mine-rescue men at Knoxville, Tenn., to rescue these men. There ought to be, and I hope the day is not far distant when Congress will see the wisdom of establishing a mine-rescue station in every mining district in the United States. [Applause.] With our immense amount of money and the wonderful resources of this country we hesitate to spend a few thousand dollars in every mining district for mine-rescue stations to protect and save the lives of the wage earners. It is a fearful responsibility. We have been spending for 100 years money on the seacoast for life-saving stations, and legislation of this kind should appeal to Congress for life-saving stations for the men that go into the mines and get fuel to run the machinery of this country and for the comfort of our homes.

Two years ago I took three of the men from the testing station at Pittsburgh, where Congress has authorized the testing of all kinds of material used in mines and mining—mining lamps, dynamite, powder, and explosions from gas and dust, and so forth. I took three of their best men into the mining camps of the district I represent, and with stereopticon views and lectures we brought home to the miners important lessons in reference to the protection of life and the prevention of accidents in mines. In these meetings, largely attended by the superintendent, the foreman, and operators, miners and their families, we distributed bulletins from the department carrying full and explicit information in reference to powders, explosions, safety lamps, and so forth.

Then we have been taking the mine-rescue car to the mining camps and having lectures delivered to the men. We had a meeting and a public exhibition at Knoxville, Tenn., in the customhouse, and had operators, owners of mines, the superintendents, foremen, and as many of the miners as we could secure, and they saw the use of the oxygen helmet and listened to the lectures delivered along with the stereopticon views showing the mining work, the operations, and matters connected with mine explosions.

So it gives me special pleasure not only to approve this bill, but to call to the attention of Congress the deserving merits of this new bureau, which ought to grow and be aided, encouraged, and strengthened by this Congress and, in fact, every Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD by printing a memorial.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the nature of the article he refers to?

Mr. TRIBBLE. It is a memorial of ceremonies at the unveiling of the statue of Robert H. Long, who discovered the use of ether, and two or three speeches on that subject.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to pose here as an objector, but the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been loaded down with so much outside material of this character that I believe it is to the interest of the American Congress and the American people that it be curtailed, and I shall therefore have to object.

[Mr. POWERS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. RAKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I shall not tax the patience of the committee with a lengthy speech this evening, but there are one or two matters which I particularly want to call your attention to. One of these is the question of foreign immigration.

The status of that question before Congress can be briefly stated. In 1907 the friends of restriction proposed to enact a law against the admission of illiterate foreigners into the United States. By the illiterate is meant those foreigners over 14 years of age who can neither read nor write in any language. The illiteracy test was sidetracked by Congress in 1907 by appointment of a commission to look into the whole question and report to Congress. The commission spent something like four years' time and a million dollars of the people's money making the investigation. They reported in favor of the illiteracy test.

During this session of Congress a bill prescribing the illiteracy test has passed the Senate. A similar bill has been favorably reported to the House from its Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

A majority of the Senate have already signified their approval of the bill.

No man doubts that the lower House is overwhelmingly in favor of it.

Then, in the name of common sense, why do we not pass the bill?

The farmers' unions and the labor organizations all over the country have demanded this very law year in and year out for a decade. A great majority of patriotic Americans in every walk of life are in favor of staying the tide of ignorant and vicious immigration.

What then, Mr. Chairman, is the matter that this bill to keep out 200,000 a year of the illiterate from the south and east of Europe is being strangled and smothered.

We hear a good deal about progression and progressives. Here, my brethren, is an opportunity for genuine progress. Where are the progressives?

We hear a flood of talk about giving more power to the people. It is undeniably true that the lower the percentage of a people's intelligence is the less power they can safely exercise and that the higher the rate of intelligence the more power they can safely exercise.

Here, then, is a chance for real progressives. Help me to keep out this annual 200,000 illiterates and thus make it possible for the people to exercise greater power.

I call to arms the real progressives of both parties. You are needed to-day to save this wholesome measure from being sandbagged behind the doors of the Rules Committee. We have had many progressive words and now we are in sore need of progressive works. Of progressive declamation we have been well supplied. To-day we need progressive deeds.

Mark you, Mr. Chairman, this literacy test has been recommended by the Immigration Commission appointed under the direction of Congress; a bill following that recommendation has passed the Senate; a similar bill has been reported to this House with a recommendation that it pass. And yet, sir, I am told that this measure is to be chloroformed to death in the secret conclaves of leaders who have fooled the people into the belief that they are struggling desperately for progressive legislation.

The simple truth is, Mr. Chairman, that it is the same old game of politics. The election is coming on. The foreign element in the great cities and elsewhere are very watchful; they are against restrictive immigration; they want the dumping to continue. That is, not all of them are of this way of thinking, but a very large majority are. On the other hand, the farmers' unions, the labor organizations, and patriotic Americans generally want this bill passed, but those who are for the bill are not watchful and active. They have neither threatened nor promised. But that is not the case with those who are opposing this measure. They are active, watchful, and ready to punish or reward, as the result inclines them.

The power of self-government is the power of intelligence, and yet we admit into this Republic every 12 months almost a million ignorant foreigners. They are being clothed with the ballot in largely increasing numbers.

They are congesting in the slums of the cities.

They are vexing and perplexing every social, economic, and political question.

They are incapable of self-government. Why do not we restrict this undesirable immigration?

Because we are a lot of vote-catching trimmers, and we are just now engaged in juggling the cards for an advantage in the November election.

This Congress—this progressive Congress—weeping and idolizing at the feet of Roosevelt, CLARK, or Wilson, is crying progress in a loud voice, and preparing to smother legislation to keep out of the United States illiterate foreigners who can neither read nor write in any language.

Strange it is, passing strange, that men crying that the people should have more power, that government should be brought nearer the people, should either actively conspire for or supinely submit to the strangling of this immigration measure.

Do you suppose the people of Italy or Russia are capable of free government? You know they are not, because if they were capable they would have free government.

And still you sit here unconcerned while the great steamship companies unload the worst element of those countries upon our shores by the million, to mix and mingle with you in the solution of the problems of free government. The strangling of this legislation is a cowardly piece of business. Cry progress. Cry that you are Democratic or Republican progressives, and yet you let a million from the south and east of Europe dump themselves upon our shores every 12 months, to depress the wages of our labor, debase the standard of living, and complicate every political problem that vexes our statesmanship. You need not tell me that this is not a serious matter. Nearly 200,000 of these foreigners were converted into qualified voters last year. For the most part these new-made suffragans live in the cities and their votes are controlled by the city bosses that we hear so much about.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in free government. I believe that it is possible for a virtuous, intelligent people to govern themselves. I believe such a people can get along without kings to govern them. But while I believe in the feasibility of free institutions amongst peoples who are enlightened and patriotic, I know that ignorance and vice are the death of free governments. Liberty can not live in an atmosphere of ignorance. History, ancient and modern, teaches the lesson that free governments can only endure among peoples who possess the intelligence to know the right and the virtue to do it.

SHAM PROGRESS AGAINST REAL REFORM.

Mr. Chairman, I am a progressive if that means progress, but I am disgusted with those who use the progressive movement merely for the purpose of making political progress for themselves. I have faith in the power of the people to separate the chaff from the wheat, the fustian from the good cloth, and in this progressive movement the people must and will distinguish between words and works, declamation and deeds.

I have struggled for reform all my life, and I shall continue the fight. As an old reformer, as a progressive who has been in the cause almost a quarter of a century, I know that our worst enemies are the recent converts, who, in order to prove to the people that their conversion is genuine, feel called upon to advocate radical and extreme measures. I have in mind at this moment a certain Republican politician, who is now a candidate for the first office in the Republic, having heretofore held that office for seven and a half years. This gentleman, in the matter of mere sound, the volume of words, and vehement declamation, is the greatest of all progressives, living or dead. But in the matter of works, of actual performances, he is a snare and a delusion. During his incumbency of the office of President there were more trusts formed than during any other period of our history. This gentleman actually solemnized the articles of union between the Steel Trust and the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co.; he declined to have the Harvester Trust prosecuted; he dismissed Judson Harmon from office because Harmon took the position in a trust case that "guilt is personal"; and this gentleman is trying to convince the public that he is the foe of trusts.

For a hundred years the Democratic Party has struggled for an honest administration of the tariff laws. We are in the sight of victory. This so-called progressive steps in and by a mere volume of sound convinces lots of innocent tariff reformers that he is their champion. Why, in all the years Roosevelt was President he never said a word about reducing the tariff.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. DIES. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. He did write something on the tariff in a message, but it is said the standpatters induced him to take it out, and he had to recall it from the various newspapers to whom the advance sheets had been sent in order not to have it printed.

Mr. DIES. The country does not know very much about what happened with Roosevelt behind the doors, but we do know that so far as the record is concerned he made no effort to reduce the tariff or the high cost of living, and that he dwelt in perfect peace and good will with all the trusts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

IMMIGRATION THE MOST VITAL QUESTION.

But I am straying from my theme. The most vital question in American politics to-day is the proper restriction of foreign immigration. We are taking into the body of our citizenship a great mass of new population that is not fitted for the task of self-government. The primary object of those who boost this influx is to get cheap labor, and the primary effect is to reduce the wage rate. That is bad enough. You put labor on the free list by your laws of immigration and then in your tariff laws you tax the laborer in all he buys.

But there is another and an inevitable effect which is bound to follow this large immigration. We are beginning to feel it now. That effect will be to change the whole complexion of our political institutions. We are already observing a decrease of that patience, wisdom, and self-restraint which characterized the political conduct of our forebears. Respect for the Constitution and laws of our country are on the wane. Every magazine reader of a new idea wants it enacted into law. The craze is for change, for something new, for radical innovations.

You call me a pessimist, and I am afraid I am sometimes. But I think a little pessimism now and then is not so bad as indiscriminate optimism. The captain of the ill-fated Titanic was warned of icebergs ahead, but he saw only the bright side; he was an optimist, and he believed his ship could not sink. If he had been more of a pessimist, he would have slackened the speed of his vessel and kept a stricter lookout. And so it is to-day, my colleagues, with our great ship of state. History, experience, wisdom, all warn us that there is peril in this enormous influx of foreign immigration. The captain may laugh on the bridge; the first-class passengers may revel in unconcern at the banquet table; and the steerage may slumber away in ignorance and indifference, but as sure as history repeats itself and human experience affords a guide for our feet, this great mass of ignorant immigration will result in the detriment if not the destruction of our institutions. If this is pessimism, then I am a pessimist.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am sorely disappointed about this matter. I have worked and waited for a long time to bring about this reform, and now that all is ready and victory is in sight, it sickens my soul to be cheated at the last moment by the cry of expediency.

But some day, and not far distant, I hope, the American people will become aroused over this question, and we will not stop at an illiteracy test, but the test will be capability for self-government.

Mr. Chairman, I want our party to succeed, but over and above that I want this Republic to succeed. The way for a party to succeed is to make itself worthy of success.

There is not room for more than one Socialist Party in this country, and I am willing for BERGER and Debs to have a monopoly of socialism.

All the Democracy needs to do in this hour is to stand for the principles of Democracy; for an honest revision of the tariff, an economical administration of the Government, control and regulation of the corporations, and a patriotic change of our immigration and naturalization laws. We do not need to seek out new and strange gods to follow, but it rather behooves us to return to the old-time religion of our Democratic fathers. Let others be led by fads and follies, if they will, but for the hosts of Democracy their paths are well marked and their duty is plain. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17260, and had come to no resolution thereon.

COAL-MINING OPERATIONS ON LANDS IN WYOMING.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 100 be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands for further consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 100 be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 14052. An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to issue certain reports relating to cotton; and

H. R. 21590. An act to authorize levee and drainage district No. 25, Dunklin County, Mo., to construct and maintain a levee across a branch or cut-off of St. Francis River, and to construct and maintain a levee across the mouth of the Varney River, in the State of Missouri.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2228. An act to establish Ashtabula, Ohio, a subport of entry in the customs collection district of Cuyahoga, Ohio, and for other purposes;

S. 6160. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River in the State of North Dakota;

S. 6161. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Yellowstone River in the county of Dawson, State of Montana; and

S. 6472. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain land to the First Baptist Church of Plymouth, Mass.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 14052. An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to issue certain reports relating to cotton; and

H. R. 21590. To authorize levee and drainage district No. 25, Dunklin County, Mo., to construct and maintain a levee across a branch or cut-off of St. Francis River, and to construct and maintain a levee across the mouth of the Varney River in the State of Missouri.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, May 23, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2530) granting to the city of Twin Falls, Idaho, certain lands for reservoir purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 749), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PRAY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4791) authorizing the patenting of certain lands to rural high school district No. 1 of Nez Perce County, Idaho, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 750), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RODENBERG: A bill (H. R. 24761) to add the village of National City to the cities named in sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. MILLER: A bill (H. R. 24762) to authorize James A. Gordon, Mark Gordon, Otis Gordon, Harry Gordon, and Alex Gordon, copartners, doing business as Gordon Bros. & Co., to construct a dam across the Little Fork River, in Koochiching County, Minn.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PETERS: A bill (H. R. 24763) permitting suits against the United States for damages caused by vessels owned or operated by the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24764) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WICKERSHAM: A bill (H. R. 24765) to provide for the survey of public lands in Alaska, making appropriations therefor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. SULZER: A bill (H. R. 24795) to create the Alaska railway commission, to construct a Government railroad in Alaska, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. PETERS: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 318) making provision for the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AMES: A bill (H. R. 24766) granting an increase of pension to Albert A. Melvin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24767) granting an increase of pension to George E. Butrick; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BROWN: A bill (H. R. 24768) granting an increase of pension to William F. Knisell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BUTLER: A bill (H. R. 24769) granting a pension to Horace W. Durnall; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 24770) granting an increase of pension to William E. Armstrong; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EDWARDS: A bill (H. R. 24771) for the relief of the heirs of William B. Hall; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 24772) granting an increase of pension to Anthony Krass; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 24773) for the relief of Eric Bergland; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24774) granting a pension to Ella McGuigan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LITTLEPAGE: A bill (H. R. 24775) granting an increase of pension to George Shultz; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 24776) granting an increase of pension to John W. Fuller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 24777) to correct the military record of Christopher P. Rhodes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MORGAN: A bill (H. R. 24778) granting a pension to Jesse D. McGee; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PALMER: A bill (H. R. 24779) for the relief of Jefferson Fox; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24780) for the relief of William H. Johnson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24781) for the relief of James Heiney; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 24782) for the relief of Isaac Miller; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 23, 1912.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

NOTICES ON SENATE CALENDAR.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a change in the form of printing notices, which I observe on the calendar this morning. The introduction of headlines of subjects is something I have never seen before. I asked the chairman of the subcommittee on the Titanic disaster, and he said it was not done by his request, or even with his knowledge. It seems to me, if we are to change the form of printing notices and put headlines above the notices of speeches, at least that is a matter which ought to be recommended by the Committee on Printing or some proper committee of the Senate, for if we begin to print headlines for each speech, it will extend the notices on the calendar almost indefinitely.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The direction to print the subhead of the notice given yesterday for myself was a surprise to me. I had no conversation with anyone about it. I move that the words "Titanic disaster" as a subhead be stricken from the first page of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to such action? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. BACON. We could not on this side hear one word that was said. If it is anything requiring unanimous consent, we ought to know what it is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not desire to discuss the question of the propriety of printing the heading over the notice I gave yesterday of my intention to address the Senate on Tuesday. I move that it be stricken from the notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was putting it as a request for unanimous consent rather than as a motion. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and such an order is entered. The subhead will be stricken from the calendar.

RELIEF OF APACHE INDIANS (S. DOC. NO. 695).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of an appropriation for inclusion in the Indian appropriation bill for the relief and settlement of Apache Indians held as prisoners of war at Fort Sill, Okla., $250,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair announces the erasure of his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 14083) to create a new division of the southern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Corpus Christi, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes, returned on yesterday by the President pursuant to Senate concurrent resolution No. 21. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the action thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 17756) to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5930) to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Richmond, Va., favoring the revision of the present currency system upon a permanent, sound, and scientific basis, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Hebrew-American Typographical Union, No. 83, of New York City, N. Y., remon-Typographical Union, No. 83, of New York City, remonstrating the immigration law, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the congregations of the Second Baptist Church of Selma; the Friendship Baptist Church, of Pine Apple; the First Baptist Church of Selma; and the Baptist Church of Pittsview; and of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Second Baptist Church of Selma, all in the State of Alabama, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRAWFORD presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry physicians of Potter County, N. Dak., praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. I present two memorials adopted by the Legislature of the State of Arizona. I ask that they be incorporated in the RECORD, but I feel that I should ask that they be read so that Senators may have an opportunity to make an objection, if they see fit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona does not ask that they be read?

Mr. ASHURST. I feel that I should ask that they be read that Senators may have an opportunity to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the memorials.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are memorials of the Legislature of the State of Arizona; the Chair does not understand upon what subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator upon what subject.

Mr. ASHURST. One of the memorials asks that certain relief be granted to settlers who settled in the early days before certain reservations were made. The other memorial asks for the abolition of the so-called Commerce Court.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the memorials.

The first memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

House memorial 1.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the First Legislature of Arizona, in session convened, respectfully represent:

Whereas by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed June 18, 1910, an additional court was added to the already complex judicial system of the United States, the said court being officially known as the United States Commerce Court, and designed to hear a particular class of cases arising under the interstate-commerce act of the United States; and

Whereas we believe that the said Commerce Court is being used by the railroad corporations for the purpose of blocking the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission and preventing relief from extortionate freight rates, a notable example of which is seen in the treatment of the intermountain cases, wherein, by the action of said Commerce Court, the railroads are permitted to continue to charge extortionate freight rates, extorting the sum of $500,000 per month from the people of Arizona in excess of the amount they would receive under equitable rates established by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

Whereas the said railroad companies have the right of appeal to the United States Supreme Court from the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the said United States Commerce Court does not occupy any needed or useful place in the judicial system of the United States; and

Whereas a bill has been introduced into Congress of the United States by the Hon. T. W. SIMS, Member of Congress from the State of Tennessee, looking to, and having for its purpose the abolition of the said Commerce Court; and

Whereas the State of Arizona is now represented in Congress by the Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH, the Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST, and the Hon. CARL HAYDEN: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives and the Senate of the State of Arizona, That we hereby call upon the Congress of the United States and petition it to pass said Sims bill, or in some other way to provide for the abolition of the said Commerce Court, to the end that the people may have relief from the oppressive freight rates, which the court, by its rulings, fosters and maintains.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to our Representatives in Congress, and that they be requested to do all in their power to bring about the passage of the said Sims bill, or some other measure having for its purpose the abolition of the said Commerce Court.

SAM. B. BRADNER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
M. G. CUNNIFF,
President of the Senate.

We, B. F. Thum, chief clerk of the House of Representatives, and J. M. McCollum, secretary of the Senate, of the Legislature of the State of Arizona now in session, do hereby, severally, certify that the above and foregoing is a full, true, and correct copy of house memorial No. 1, and of the whole thereof, as adopted by the Legislature of said State of Arizona.

Witness our hands this 3d day of May, 1912.

B. F. THUM,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.
CON. P. CRONIN,
Acting Secretary of the Senate.

The second memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

House memorial 2.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the House of Representatives of the first Legislature of the State of Arizona, the Senate concurring herein, respectfully represent:

That between the years of 1878 and 1892 many pioneers settled in the southern part of Arizona, and with their wives and children, formed the nucleus of a community of bona fide citizens.

In the belief that they had settled upon lands that were part of the public domain, these hardy pioneers built their homes, cultivated the soil, and, always menaced by the ravages of the Apache Indians, reared their families amidst great hardships and privations.

Secure in the belief that the soil upon which their homes were built would sooner or later be allotted to them, these pioneers continued their brave struggle against the many adverse conditions and circumstances which confront the settler in a new and undeveloped country.

Now that it is too late for these worthy citizens of our new State to make a new start in life, it develops that the lands upon which they have built their homes are included in the Spanish or Mexican land grants, the holders of which have successfully maintained suits for confirmation of these grants and have dispossessed the settlers thereon and have confiscated the improvements which represent years of toil, hardship, and privation.

These people are poor, but are good citizens of this State, and great injustice has been done them, inasmuch as they settled upon these lands in good faith, not knowing that they were claimed as land grants, but believing that they were a part of the unoccupied and unappropriated public domain of the United States, open to the settlement and occupation under the laws of the United States.

In view of the foregoing facts, and in justice and equity, your memorialists respectfully petition this honorable body that a court be established in Arizona, in the vicinity of these lands, and that said court be empowered, authorized, and directed to inquire into the damages sustained by the locators upon the various land grants within the confines of the Gadsden purchase, and that when such damages have been determined and assessed the Government of the United States provide for reimbursement of these settlers to the extent of the damage actually suffered by them.

M. G. CUNNIFF,
President of the Senate.
SAM. B. BRADNER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

We, B. F. Thum, chief clerk of the House of Representatives, and J. M. McCollum, secretary of the Senate, of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, now in session, do hereby, severally, certify that the above and foregoing is a full, true, and correct copy of house memorial No. 2, and of the whole thereof, as adopted by the Legislature of said State of Arizona.

Witness our hands this 3d day of May, 1912.

B. F. THUM,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.
CON. P. CRONIN,
Acting Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Massillon, Ohio, remonstrating against the establishment of a department of public health, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Alliance, Ohio, praying that an appropriation be made for the enforcement of the white-slave law, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and of sundry citizens of Neffs, Ohio, praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bowling Green, Ky., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transmission of race gambling odds and bets, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 6479) to authorize the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Co. to repair, alter, or rebuild certain bridges in the State of Arkansas, and I submit a report (No. 786) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I desire to have the report printed. A similar bill is pending in the House, and this bill will await action on that bill for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be printed under the rule, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 23634. An act to authorize the village of Oslo, in the county of Marshall, in the State of Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North (Rept. No. 787);

H. R. 23461. An act authorizing the fiscal court of Pike County, Ky., to construct a bridge across Russell Fork of Big Sandy River, at or near Millard, Ky. (Rept. No. 788);

H. R. 21290. An act to amend an act to authorize a bridge at or near Council Bluffs, Iowa, approved February 1, 1908, as amended (Rept. No. 789); and

H. R. 23460. An act authorizing the fiscal court of Pike County, Ky., to construct a bridge across Russell Fork of the Big Sandy River, at Marrowbone, Ky. (Rept. No. 790).

Mr. OLIVER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 6678) authorizing the Secretary of War, under certain conditions, to detail officers of the Corps of Engineers to perform the engineering work necessary for the construction of a canal between Lake Erie and the Ohio River, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 791) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I prefer that the bill should go over to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes to the calendar.

Mr. OLIVER, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 6332) to restore to the active list First Lieut. of Engineers Henry O. Slayton, retired, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 792) thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 793) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21597) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 794) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16690) for the relief of scientific institutions or colleges of learning having violated sections 3297 and 3297a of the Revised Statutes and the regulations thereunder, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 795) thereon.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2852) for the relief of the Title Guaranty & Surety Co. of Scranton, Pa., surety for David B. Wickersham, submitted an adverse report (No. 797) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back adversely the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool. (S. Rept. 840.)

In this connection I desire to state that at an early day the majority members of the Finance Committee expect to report a wool bill to be offered as a substitute for the one that is adversely reported.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah if that bill is accompanied by a written report of the views of the majority?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no written report, Mr. President. The bill is simply reported adversely, and I ask that it go to the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Idaho will pardon me one moment, I will state that the minority will file its views in favor of the original House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. And the opinion of the majority of the Republican members of the committee will be, of course, expressed in the bill that will be offered as a substitute, if it shall be offered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not know of any authority given to promise legislation or submit proposed legislation in the nature of a new wool bill. Until the committee has prepared and agreed upon such a bill and has by a vote of the committee authorized it to be reported, I think no such promise as that should be made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course there will be no bill reported as a committee bill without a vote of the committee. If the Senator would prefer, then, I will say that I reserve the right personally——

Mr. SIMMONS. We on this side can not hear what is being said on account of the confusion in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will please cease conversation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to suggest that our inability to hear is not due simply to the fact of the confusion, but Senators are getting in the habit of talking in so low a tone that no one can hear them 20 feet away.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if there was not so much talk in the Chamber I do not think any Senator would have difficulty in hearing what has already been said.

I was saying that I did not claim that any wool bill would be reported to the Senate as the bill of the majority members of the committee until after the committee had voted upon such a bill. I will say that the majority members of the Finance Committee reserve the right to report a bill to be offered as a substitute for the bill that has been reported adversely, namely, the House wool bill.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no necessity for reserving that right.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not think that it is prudent at this time to promise to the country a bill that is not yet formulated. I do not think it is wise to send out through the press of the country a promise to report a bill that is not yet formulated. I think the effect of it will be to cause an impression among the public that the Republican Party is going to enter upon a revision of the wool schedule.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator had taken his seat. I will not interrupt him, but I will later take the floor in my own time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought I could be seen. I did not know that I was invisible.

I do not intend to do more than to say that, if I understood the Senator from Utah correctly, he did say that the committee—a majority of the committee—would report a bill. There is no one authorized to say that upon this floor.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee reserves the right, Mr. President, to offer a bill and to present it as a substitute for this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the committee do not need to reserve the right; they have the right under the rules of legislation. What I object to is the sending out to the country of a statement that the Republican Party is going to enter upon the revision of the wool schedule. Until a committee has acted there should be no promise of that kind from a committee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not understand that any promise whatever has been made. The Senator from Utah made an absolutely correct announcement, the usual announcement where a substitute is being considered and may be offered, that the committee reserves the right to offer a substitute later. That is the understanding of the majority of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not like to protract the consideration of a question of this kind, which is more a volunteer statement than a responsible one. I do not know that it is within the practice either of this body or of the committees of this body to forestall action or to prophesy as to the action of a committee. My objection is to having the party placed under a pledge or a promise that they will enter upon the consideration of such a measure.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Utah made the promise—and I think a reference to the stenographer's notes will verify my statement—that the committee would do this, and then he modified it by the suggestion that he would do it on his own responsibility.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course——

Mr. PENROSE. I believe I have been recognized, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania was recognized.

Mr. PENROSE. I simply desire to state that the Senator from Utah is entirely correct, from what I know of the attitude of the committee. It is the hope of the majority of the members of the Finance Committee that we shall be able, if the limited time at our disposal will permit, to bring in a wool bill based on the report of the Tariff Board, and it is at least the hope of most of the Republican members that we shall be able to unite on a measure for the consideration of the Senate. Whether such a bill is likely to pass in the present condition of both branches of Congress, of course, is another question; but the Republican members will feel that they have discharged their duty in submitting a measure on the wool schedule based on the report of the Tariff Board.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course it is obvious that there is some difference in opinion in regard to the action to be taken in reference to this measure. The Senator from Pennsylvania has just fortified the statement made—that is, the last statement made—by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] by bringing into the consideration the report of some board and the credence or the credit that will be given to its action. Of course I am speaking upon the assumption that Congress is going to legislate and that we have no master nor have we any agent authorized to direct us how we shall legislate or upon what subjects we shall legislate.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not understand that the Republican members of the Finance Committee will be in any way controlled as to rates by the report of the Tariff Board. That board has been scrupulous and careful in not making any recommendations on that vital feature of tariff legislation. When I said that the bill would be based on the report of the Tariff Board I intended to say that the data showing the difference in the cost of labor and the cost of conversion and the other elements entering into the growing of wool and the manufacture of woolen goods between this country and Europe will be duly weighed and considered by the Republican members of the committee. They will supplement the omissions of the Tariff Board report, if any exist, by knowledge available and at hand, and they will use their own judgment, I take it, as Republicans to frame a bill which will be amply and adequately protective to the woolgrower in the West and the woolen manufacturer in the East.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I think a word will clarify this whole situation. The truth of it is that a majority of the Republicans of the Finance Committee are ready to confess that the Payne-Aldrich bill needs revision and the Senator from Idaho is not willing to join them in that confession. That is about the situation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Nor do I propose to be spoken for by anyone undertaking to make a statement in the nature of a promise as to the action to be taken by a committee upon a subject not yet acted upon by the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator from Idaho does not, if he will pardon me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Idaho does not agree that the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, with respect to the wool schedule, needs revision.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Texas states my position accurately. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. I was sure of that, and I also state the position of the other Republicans accurately when I say they confess that it does need revision by promising to revise it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am consistent with the position which I took in voting upon the Payne-Aldrich bill. I do not change my mind on the policy or wisdom of legislation over night merely because some outsider suggests that we might possibly have acted more wisely at that time. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

DISTRICT POLICEMEN'S AND FIREMEN'S PENSION FUND.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 11th day of May the bill (H. R. 20840) to provide for deficiencies in the fund for police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia was passed. Subsequently it was recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I desire to report the bill, having omitted the paragraph to which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] objected and simply restoring one fund that had been inadvertently omitted from the former bill, and I submit a report (No. 796) thereon. The bill has been once read and acted upon, and I trust it may be passed without being read again. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill, having once been read in full and he having stated what changes are now made in it, may be put upon its passage without further reading. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That from and after the passage of this act the funds designated by law as the "policemen's fund," the "police fund," and the "firemen's relief fund" shall be designated as the "police and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia," and the said fund shall consist of all fines imposed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon members of the police and fire departments by way of discipline; all rewards, proceeds of gifts, and emoluments that may be received by any member of said departments for extraordinary services, except such as may be allowed to be retained by such member or members, on the approval of the said commissioners; all net receipts and moneys arising from the sale of unclaimed property in the custody of the property clerk of the police department; a deduction of 2 per cent of the monthly salary of each member of the police and fire departments; and fines and forfeitures paid into the police court of the District of Columbia, except those allowed by law to the use of the Humane Society; receipts from dog licenses; and receipts from insurance licenses; all of which shall be collected by the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia and be by him deposited in the Treasury of the United States, in the manner provided by law, to the credit of the trust fund denominated "police and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia," and be held subject to the drafts of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the purposes hereinafter set forth; all expenditures to be made according to law and to be accounted for in the manner provided by law.

SEC. 2. That whenever any officer or member of the police or fire department of the District of Columbia shall become disabled by injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty he shall, in addition to his regular salary, receive his necessary expenses during the time of such disability, to be ascertained and certified by the retiring board hereinafter provided for, whose certificate shall state an account of said expenses and the manner, cause, and condition of the injury or disease, and such necessary expenses shall, when approved by the said commissioners, be paid out of the said police and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That should any officer or member of the police or fire department become so permanently disabled through injury or disease contracted in the line of duty, or, having served not less than 15 years, shall, for any cause, become so permanently disabled as to be discharged from the service therefor, he shall be entitled to relief from the said fund in an amount, in the case of an officer or member of the fire department, as follows: Chief engineer, a sum not to exceed $100 per month; deputy chief engineer, a sum not to exceed $95 per month; battalion chief, fire marshal, and superintendent of machinery, a sum not to exceed $75 per month; deputy fire marshals and captains, a sum not to exceed $65 per month; lieutenants, a sum not to exceed $50 per month; assistant superintendent of machinery, a sum not to exceed $50 per month; engineers and drivers, a sum not to exceed $50 per month; assistant engineers and assistant drivers, a sum not to exceed $50 per month; inspectors and privates, a sum not to exceed $50 per month.

And in the case of an officer or member of the police department as follows: Major and superintendent, a sum not to exceed $100 per month; inspector and assistant superintendent, a sum not to exceed $100 per month; inspector, a sum not to exceed $100 per month; captain, a sum not to exceed $100 per month; lieutenant, a sum not to exceed $100 per month; sergeant, a sum not to exceed $50 per month; private, a sum not to exceed $50 per month, as may be justified, in any case of the police and fire departments, by the length of service and the nature of the injury or disease, as such disability may be determined by the retiring board hereinafter provided for; that in case of the death of any officer or member of the police or fire department before or after retirement from injury or disease contracted in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or children under 16 years of age, or a dependent father or mother, or both, such widow or such relative shall be entitled to a pension to be paid from the said relief fund, the amount thereof to be determined by the retiring board hereinafter provided for: Provided, That in no case shall the amount paid to any one family exceed the sum of $50 per month, and that upon the remarriage of any widow her pension under this act shall immediately cease, and that any pension to or for her children under 16 years of age shall cease upon their attaining such age.

SEC. 4. That a sum not to exceed $75 may be allowed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to be paid from the said police and firemen's relief fund, to defray the funeral expenses of any member of the police or fire department who may die while in the service of such department.

SEC. 5. That a retiring board, to be composed of the surgeons of the police and fire departments, two officers of the police department and two officers of the fire department, not surgeons, such officers to be appointed by and to serve during the pleasure of the Commissioners of said District, and the health officer of the District of Columbia shall be appointed to consider all cases for relief or for retirement or for pensions of officers and members of the police and fire departments, and all applications for pensions for widows, children, and dependent fathers or mothers; and the police and fire surgeons shall certify in writing to the said retiring board the physical condition of the officers or members of the force, if living, for whom a pension is sought for any reason provided for in this act, and whether or not said condition or death is due to injury or disease contracted in the line of duty, or that said officer or member has become so permanently disabled as to entitle him to discharge from the service therefor. The said retiring board shall give notice to any applicant for relief or pension or retirement to be present before it and give any evidence that he may desire, and the proceedings of the said board shall be reduced to writing and shall show the date of appointment of the officer or member under inquiry, his age, his record in the service, and any other information that may be pertinent to the matter of relief, pension, or retirement, and shall show what amount, if any, is awarded the applicant by way of relief or pension. The said board shall make a report of its finding to the commissioners, who shall have the power to take further testimony, if they so desire, and may approve, disapprove, or modify the findings of the said board, or remand any case for such further proceedings as may be necessary, and the decision of the said commissioners shall be final. The said commissioners are also hereby authorized and empowered to make, modify, and amend from time to time rules of procedure for the conduct of such board.

SEC. 6. That within 60 days following the 1st day of July, 1912, and every two years thereafter, the commissioners shall cause every policeman and fireman receiving a pension allowance from the police and firemen's relief fund to undergo such examination as in the judgment of the commissioners may be necessary to enable them to determine whether the pension in such case or cases shall be increased or reduced; and the commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to increase or reduce the allowance of pensioners as the result of such examination: Provided, however, That should a pensioner fail or refuse to undergo the examination prescribed by the commissioners, the allowance of such pensioner may be reduced or entirely discontinued by the commissioners: Provided, however, That the commissioners may discontinue any pension or retirement allowance upon duly certified information from a court of record that any person so pensioned or retired has been guilty of any crime involving moral turpitude or where any such person is found by the retiring board, after notice and trial, to be an habitual drunkard or guilty of lewd or lascivious conduct: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to give the widow of any officer or member of the police or fire department any right to a pension upon her remarriage, or to give any child or children of any officer or member of said police or fire department the right to a pension after becoming 16 years of age.

SEC. 7. That any such pensioned or retired officer or member of the police or fire department in time of flood, riot, great fires, during extraordinary assemblages or unusual emergencies, may be called by the head of the respective department into the service of the District police or fire force for such duty as his disabilities will permit of his performing, as ascertained and certified by the retiring board, without compensation therefor.

SEC. 8. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the creation of the police and firemen's relief and retirement fund, to provide for the relief and retirement of members of the police and fire departments, to establish a method of procedure for such relief and retirement, and for other purposes."

GETTYSBURG NATIONAL MILITARY PARK.

Mr. DU PONT. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3218) providing for the dedication of the Gettysburg National Military Park, at Gettysburg, Pa., to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Commission on the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order will be made carrying out the desire of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is no committee on the fiftieth anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg. That is a commission, and I do not know that we can refer anything to a commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Gettysburg Commission, if there be no objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Perhaps I did not make my point plain. I suggested that we had not the power to refer a bill to a commission. A commission can not report a bill. It must come from a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho object to the disposition made of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; on the ground of want of power to do it. The bill ought to lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill, then, will lie on the table.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER INTAKE TOWER AT ST. LOUIS.

Mr. REED. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 22999) providing for the construction and maintenance by the city of St. Louis, Mo., of an intake tower in the Mississippi River, at St. Louis, Mo., to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 784) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is purely local.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEO N. LEVI MEMORIAL HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5602) authorizing the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association to occupy and construct buildings for the use of the corporation on lots Nos. 3 and 4, block No. 114, in the city of Hot Springs, Ark., to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 785) thereon.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the by-laws of the association be printed in the RECORD in connection with the passage of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not advised as to whether they can be obtained at this time. This is an association which consists of a number of Jewish people——

Mr. GALLINGER. I know it is.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Who intend to erect a building at this place.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to avoid a question of sectarianism, and therefore I suggest that the by-laws be published.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If I can secure possession of them, they will be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, when the by-laws can be obtained, they will be printed in the RECORD.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 6929) for the relief of the Wales Island Packing Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 6930) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CULLOM:

A bill (S. 6931) granting an increase of pension to Jesse A. Moore; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 6932) increasing the cost of erecting a United States post-office building at Fairmont, W. Va.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SANDERS:

A bill (S. 6933) for the relief of Reese K. Henderson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 6934) to provide for an extension of time for payment of all unpaid payments due from homesteaders on the Uintah Indian Reservation; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. BURNHAM:

A bill (S. 6935) for the relief of Frances Gurley Elderkin; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WETMORE:

A bill (S. 6936) to amend the act authorizing the National Academy of Sciences to receive and hold trust funds for the promotion of science, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CRANE:

A bill (S. 6937) granting an increase of pension to Emma L. Tappan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GUGGENHEIM:

A bill (S. 6938) granting an increase of pension to James Moynahan; to the Committee on Pensions.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriations for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EIGHT-HOUR LABOR LAW.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9061) limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States or for any Territory or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. BURNHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 21226) relating to compensation of clerks of United States district courts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

DEPUTY COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. CRANE submitted an amendment proposing that the positions of deputy collectors of internal revenue of the United States shall not become vacant by reason of a vacancy in the collectorship, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 24023), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF NAVAL BOARD.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 318) which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to transmit to the Senate the report of the board appointed March 13, 1903, to consider the question of transferring certain offices of the Navy Department to the Department of Commerce and Labor.

ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF IMMIGRATION (S. DOC. NO. 696).

Mr. PENROSE. I ask to have printed as a public document a pamphlet on the economic aspects of immigration, by Isaac A. Hourwich, which I am informed is a very important contribution to the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection an order therefor will be entered.

LAND AT MAGDALENA BAY (S. DOC. NO. 694).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, submitted in response to the Senate resolution of May 16, 1912, calling upon him "to send to the Senate copies of letters from the attorney or others for the American syndicate interested in Magdalena Bay, and copies of letters written in reply to the same by the department officials, referred to in the letter of the Secretary of State as published in Senate Document 640."

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 23, 1912.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 17756. An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask for some information from a member of the Committee on Territories. At the last session of this Congress I introduced a bill (H. R. 38) providing for a Territorial form of government for Alaska. Quite awhile ago the bill passed the House of Representatives by practically a unanimous vote. That bill has gone to the Committee on Territories. I should like to know whether the committee is giving these bills any consideration and what the prospects are for a report, either favorable or unfavorable, at an early date.

Mr. NELSON. In the absence of the chairman of the committee, I desire to say that the chairman of the Committee on Territories is chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce which has been investigating the Titanic disaster. Since that investigation begun he has been exceedingly busy with the matter, but the committee is now considering its final report, and after that this matter will be taken up.

Mr. JONES. I certainly hope so, because I think this is one of the measures that Congress should act upon one way or the other before it adjourns. While I want to give the committee an opportunity to consider the matter, I hope action will be taken within a very short while. If not, I shall take whatever steps are necessary to have the measure passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a measure on the calendar which might be considered at this time——

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] gave notice that he would address the Senate at the close of the routine morning business to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not want to bring in anything ahead of him.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is not morning business, but it is not giving due courtesy to a Senator who has given notice that he would speak as soon as the morning business was concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am quite capable of judging of the question of courtesy involved, and it seems to me unseemly that there should be any Senator who would directly or indirectly——

Mr. BRISTOW. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Senate resume consideration of the unfinished business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely want to remark, in order that it may not be overlooked, that the same objection would apply that is made by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand the Senator to make any objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I object.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want to object, but I want to call attention——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina will not insist upon asking for unanimous consent in view of the fact that the Senator from South Dakota gave notice that he would begin his speech immediately after the close of the morning business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no disposition to interfere with the speech of the Senator from South Dakota, and I did not understand it would interfere with him. The Senator can go on with his speech after this bill is before the Senate. I am not desirous of displacing him at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from South Dakota objects.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not going to address my remarks to that subject at all. I am going to speak to the joint resolution which I introduced and which lies on the table, and I ask that it be laid before the Senate, because my remarks will be directed to that joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's remarks are to be addressed to another matter, and he ought to have the privilege of proceeding. It has never been refused.

Mr. SIMMONS. For myself I will not object; but I will state that I conferred with the Senator from South Dakota this morning, and I understood him as not objecting to going on with his speech. Of course, if he objects, I will withdraw the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws the request, and, without objection, Senate resolution 109 will be laid before the Senate for the purpose of discussion only.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that Senate joint resolution 109 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution, which will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 109) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following be proposed as an amendment of section 1 of Article III of the Constitution of the United States, which will be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, namely: Amend said section 1 to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. The judges of the Supreme Court shall hold their offices during good behavior. The judges of the inferior courts shall hold their offices for terms of 10 years."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, in that most remarkable opinion written by James Wilson, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which he gave the reasons upon which the court based its decision in the case of Chisholm against the State of Georgia, rendered in 1792, he said the real question before the court was, "Do the people of the United States form a Nation?" He observes also that in all our study of government we should not forget that it is not the artificial persons called states, but it is men who think, and speak, and act. He further curiously observes that when Homer enumerates the other nations of Greece whose forces acted at the siege of Troy, he arranges them under the names of their different kings or princes, but that he distinguished the Athenians by always referring to them as "The People of Athens," and that Demosthenes stirred his countrymen most when he began his orations with the words, "O Men of Athens!"

The Constitution was ordained and established by the people of the United States, as declared in its preamble, and not by a group of artificial public corporate bodies called States. James Wilson, looking through these artificial structures, saw beyond them, and recognized that at the foundation of the great superstructure were human beings—men and women with warm, human blood in their veins—and that the Government was of them, by them, and for them.

He understood that the Constitution and laws of the new Republic were made for society and that society was not to be sacrificed by a construction which might follow the letter but which would destroy the spirit. Notwithstanding the fact that the decision in this early case was "recalled," in a sense, by the people by the adoption of the eleventh amendment, declaring that—

> The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State or subjects of any foreign State—

The observations of the great jurist whose language I have just quoted are as true to-day as when he made them in 1792.

It is apparent to all that we have just entered upon a fierce struggle, which is to be waged between contending forces, not for the few months of a political campaign only, but for years—it may be for a generation—a struggle and controversy in which the American people will reexamine and pass upon questions of far-reaching importance involving the foundations and the structure of their Government. During this period of contention and controversy we shall all have occasion to recur again and again to the great charter of our Government and to those historic settings in which it was placed by our fathers. In approaching what I wish to say, I may be pardoned for dwelling for a minute, in passing, upon this familiar subject.

At many points the Great Charter of our Government was the result of compromise. The situation at the time of its making was full of difficulty. The small States were jealous of the large States. The slave States were jealous of the free States. Many people in all the States were jealous of centralized Federal power, while the believers in a strong Federal Government were jealous of the power of sovereignty claimed by the individual States. These difficulties were adjusted by concession and compromise. To win the support of the slave States that ill-fated clause was adopted under which representation in Congress was apportioned according to population, ascertained by adding to the whole number of free persons three-fifths of the slaves; also that other provision for the return of a fugitive slave to his owner. Thus recognized as a right of property by the Constitution itself, slavery in all its worse forms flourished in this land of liberty for more than 70 years—from 1789 to 1865—when the thirteenth amendment was ratified.

That amendment was a long time coming, and followed as the immediate consequence of one of the bloodiest wars in human history; and as the result of more than 70 years of controversy and contention, during which one party maintained that the Federal Union was a mere league, which could be terminated at any moment by the voluntary withdrawal of one or more of the States, while another party maintained that the Constitution was ordained by the people of a Nation and that the union which it created could not be dissolved except by force, violence, or revolution. It was, indeed, an angry and bitter controversy, which soon became sectional in character. Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, John C. Calhoun, and Jefferson Davis on one side; Hamilton, James Wilson, John Marshall, Daniel Webster, and Abraham Lincoln on the opposing side; these, and others whom I can not take time to name here, are great figures standing in the foreground of any picture which truthfully represents that controversial and momentous period in the history of this Republic.

Although the question remained for so long a time unsettled, we now see clearly that the attempt to establish a permanent Federal Union of the States must have ended in utter failure within the first two decades which followed the adoption of the Constitution if the views so stubbornly urged by Jefferson, Calhoun, and Davis had found sanction in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It was, indeed, fortunate that the fathers established that court as a coordinate and independent department of the Government and made it the depository of its judicial power with provision that the tenure of office held by the judges should depend entirely upon good behavior and duration of human life; because in those earlier years of superheated and angry debate and division over questions relating to the power and jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, in construing statutes and provisions of the Constitution, to nullify a statute, whether enacted by Congress or by the legislature of a State, whenever it clearly appears to the court that such statute is repugnant to the Constitution, judges, whose tenure of office depended upon public sentiment, would not have dared to meet the storms of denunciation and criticism and the howls of rage and bitterness which Chief Justice Marshall encountered with calmness and serenity after each of the great decisions by which, with supreme courage and convincing logic boldly expressed in clear and specific language, he established the supremacy of the Constitution so completely that nothing less than civil war could hope to overthrow it. Or had they been equal to the great responsibility and decided as Marshall did such judges would have paid the penalty by dismissal from office .

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I esteem it a great privilege to listen to this learned address. I understood the distinguished Senator to make some reference to the Constitution of the United States, or some provision thereof, which authorized the courts to hold certain laws unconstitutional. Did I hear aright?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No, sir; there is no specific provision except that they are invested with the judicial power. I said they were made the depository of judicial power.

Mr. ASHURST. There is no specific provision?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No, sir; there is no specific provision, nor did I so assert.

Mr. President, our fathers wanted an independent judiciary. They created a system of government essentially different from that of Great Britain from which they had so recently declared their independence. In England there was no Federal union of States; no division of powers; all power—executive, legislative, and judicial—was vested in an omnipotent Parliament; there were no written constitutions, either State or Federal. The British constitution was a mass of unwritten precedents and traditions, subject to change by a simple act of Parliament—the result of an appeal to the country. Executive ministers and judges of courts were members of one or the other of the Houses of Parliament and subject to its supreme control. The whole fabric of British Government rested upon custom and practice not defined nor limited by any written charter. It was an evolutionary growth, described in this fashion by Lord Macaulay:

> To think nothing of symmetry and much of convenience; never to remove an anomaly merely because it is an anomaly; never to innovate except so far as to get rid of the grievance; never to lay down any proposition of wider extent than the particular case for which it is necessary to provide; these are the rules which have, from the age of John to the age of Victoria, guided the deliberations of our 250 Parliaments.

From that system of government by Parliament our fathers broke away and erected another, based upon written constitutions underlying the several States, and upon a written Constitution binding all the States into a Federal Union—a system which divided the power of government into three separate and specifically defined divisions, making of each a distinct, separate, and coordinate department—placing limitations upon it and permitting it to exercise no power except that expressly delegated to it. They declared that this written Constitution, ordained and established by the American people—and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties entered into by the United States—shall be "the supreme law of the land," and that the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, "anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

They placed limitations upon the power of Congress by prohibiting it from passing bills of attainder or ex post facto laws; from levying a duty upon articles exported from any State; from enacting laws interfering with the free exercise of religion; from abridging freedom of speech or of the press; from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; from interfering with the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for redress of grievances.

They also placed prohibitions upon the States by declaring that no State shall coin money or emit bills of credit; or, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports; or enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power. How were these prohibitions to be made effective if not by the courts?

I ask the question again: Here are limitations upon the States; here are limitations upon Congress; how are these limitations to be made effective if not by the courts? There is only one other way, and that would be by the exercise of military force.

Yet in those earlier years a great many people contended with much vehemence that the courts had no power or authority to declare a legislative enactment void even though that act were clearly repugnant to the Constitution or to a treaty of the United States with a foreign power.

Some people, even in our day, suggest that this power be taken from the Supreme Court. They apparently fail to realize that its withdrawal would mean the dissolution of the Union. Mr. Justice Wilson and Chief Justice Marshall saw clearly how necessary it was that the Supreme Court firmly recognize the supremacy of the Constitution over legislative and executive as well as judicial action if the United States was to become a Nation. Wilson took the first step when he announced the decision of the court in the great case of Chisholm against the State of Georgia. Marshall completed the work so well begun by Wilson when, in a series of ever-memorable decisions, he declared in behalf of the court that an act of Congress or an act of the legislature of a State or a decision of the highest judicial tribunal of a State is void when clearly repugnant to the Federal Constitution or to any treaty between the United States and a foreign nation. Had the court failed to so decide any one of these three propositions in favor of the supremacy of the Constitution and treaties, the union of the States under that Constitution would have gone down. Disunion would have come while Abraham Lincoln was yet a barefooted boy in the woods of his native Kentucky; but men can be found who will assert that John Marshall was a usurper. Let us suppose for a moment that the Supreme Court had played the coward and—quailing before the violent assaults made upon it—had declined to assume the great responsibility of upholding the paramountcy of the Federal Constitution. What would have been the result?

The State of New York would have successfully maintained exclusive control over navigation on the Hudson and Federal control of commerce between the States would have been defeated. New York could have closed her ports to New England and imposed duties upon imports from New Jersey and Pennsylvania; Maryland could have taxed the Bank of the United States and issued bills of credit and coined money; Rhode Island could have successfully enacted a State bankruptcy law, by which the obligations of contract could have been annulled and debts legally repudiated; Virginia and the Carolinas could have made agreements or compacts with each other or with a foreign power. On the other hand, Congress could have passed laws levying duties upon articles exported from one or more of the States; or interfering with State autonomy; or with the purely domestic affairs and local police regulations of the States; it might have passed bills of attainder or ex post facto laws, or laws which would deprive citizens of their lives, liberties, and property without due process; or laws which would take away the power and destroy the efficiency of the executive and judicial departments.

In other words, had it not been for the check put upon it by the Supreme Court in upholding the spirit of the Constitution, Congress might have usurped all governmental power.

These decisions made the Constitution a living instrument, expanding under the enlightened construction of the court and keeping pace with the needs of a growing nation. Otherwise it would have been a mere idle declaration upon paper, such as the constitution of Mexico is to-day; or like those paper constitutions of the French Republic in the days of the Revolution. Indeed, nothing less than the exercise of this power by the Supreme Court could have brought into harmonious relation all these State laws, State constitutions, and acts of Congress. It is idle to talk about the British system, in which Parliament is above the courts. To return to that system would be to abolish or abandon our own; it would mean nothing less than revolution and a wholesale destruction of the American scheme of Federal government. The British system may be better than ours—I do not think so—but it is only the wildest and most impractical dreamer who would seriously propose such a revolution, as the adoption of that system would cause in our form of government, which depends so largely upon the independence of the judicial department as the check and balance between the executive and legislative departments, and which provides the way by which to maintain the coordination of the States. Mr. Lincoln found ample justification for the use of force in preventing seceding States from withdrawing from the Union in the language of Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens against Virginia, where the great jurist declares:

> It is usurpation whenever a part undertakes to do what the whole can not be kept from doing. * * * The people made the Constitution and they can unmake it, but this power resides only in the whole body of the people, not in any subdivision of them. The attempt of any of the parts to exercise it is usurpation and ought to be repelled by those to whom the people have delegated their power.

This was a clear declaration in favor of the power under the Constitution to coerce a State and against the right of a State to secede from the Union. Could the "recall of judges" have been invoked against Mr. Marshall at that time of intense feeling he would probably have been turned out of office.

In contending for the independence and fearlessness of the judiciary I do not wish to be misunderstood. There is much which calls for criticism in the administration of our courts. There are many defects in judicial procedure, both civil and criminal, which all admit should be remedied. While, as a rule, our judges have been and are men of the highest integrity and honor, singularly free from undue influence, there are exceptions, of course, where, unfortunately, powerful and selfish influences reach the judge and secure unfair advantage; but such cases are rare. When the court is a State tribunal and the term of the judge elective, the people can easily correct abuses if they earnestly desire by reforming the judicial procedure, shortening the term of the judges, and refusing to reelect the unworthy ones.

The written constitution of every State in this Union, in my opinion, should provide simple and comparatively easy means for proposing and submitting constitutional amendments to a vote of the people. The amendment of the constitution of a State is quite a different thing, both in character and effect, from an amendment of the great charter which binds together 48 States in bonds of Federal union.

The free exercise of police powers by the people of a State through the enactment and execution of State laws should not be hindered and delayed by narrow and technical restrictions imposed by State courts. It is easy to understand why a strong and vigorous demand is made for relief against the barriers which decisions of that kind put in the way of progress and the public welfare, and why it is proposed that some method be devised under which an amendment to a State constitution may be proposed and submitted to the people for approval which will have the effect of so construing or amending the constitution as to remove the evil effects of the decision complained of. But that, of course, is a matter for the several States to deal with. It does not concern the Congress of the United States. The States can deal with it effectively any time public sentiment is aroused sufficiently to really and earnestly desire to make such a change. But the remedy is more difficult where the judge is a Federal officer holding his position during life and good behavior, and where he can not be removed except by impeachment. The inferior Federal courts, however, are creatures of statute. Except as to tenure of office, Congress can control them. It may in its discretion abolish them or reduce their powers or limit their jurisdiction. The irritation and the uneasiness of the people and their hostility to the courts are directed largely against these inferior Federal courts, and should an amendment such as I have proposed, fixing the term of the judges of these courts at a period of 10 years, be submitted, it would, in my humble opinion, be ratified by three-fourths of the States because of a prevailing opinion that some of these Federal judges are too indifferent to the rights of the people and not sufficiently responsive to present-day needs and present-day conditions when passing upon issues between the people and special interests. The fact that at the expiration of a fixed term his conduct as a judge would come under review by the President and the Senate, both of them, when determining whether or not he should be reappointed, acting under the scrutiny and watchful eye of the public, would not destroy his independence, but it would operate as a wholesome restraint upon the judge, while the expiration of his term would furnish the opportunity to dispense with the service of an unworthy or incompetent man. I for one am inclined to believe that an amendment of this kind would improve the Federal judiciary. Congress has, perhaps, created too many inferior courts and been too liberal in granting to them powers of injunction, particularly in proceedings against the officers of a State attempting to enforce the statute of a State. It is a matter of doubt whether the new courts of customs and of commerce were wisely established.

These inferior and intermediate courts, anxious to enlarge their jurisdiction by interfering frequently with the orders and findings of administrative boards and commissions of the Government, are often the means of delaying rather than promoting justice; but Congress may abolish them whenever in its wisdom it chooses to do so. Our courts and the administration of justice must command the confidence and respect of the people if the Government is to endure.

It behooves us to heed the complaints that are being made on every hand in regard to glaring defects in the civil and criminal procedure of both the State and Federal judiciary. Mere technicalities, appeals based upon quibbles and taken for delay, unnecessary peremptory challenges of jurors and immaterial objections to their competency, adherences to worn-out precedents, and ancient rules not adapted to needs of the present must all be swept away if our courts are to retain their hold on the affections of the people. An effective and speedy method, judicial in character, but more simple and surer of results than proceedings by impeachment should be provided by which bad and unworthy judges may be dismissed from office. But, on the other hand, let us beware that in our eagerness to correct existing evils we do not adopt methods exposed to far greater evils than those we would remove. This, I fear, would be the case if the judiciary were subjected to what is known as the recall, and should that "sword of Damocles" be held over the heads of the judges? The honest and fearless judge must often decide cases against strong public prejudice and hostile public sentiment if he does his duty and applies the rules of law and justice. The tenure of office held by him should never be made to depend upon the decision of the majority of the voters in his district, expressed by ballot at the close of a heated campaign, forced upon him by a minority petition signed ex parte; a campaign in which the issue is whether or not he correctly weighed the testimony and applied the law in causes tried by him. We should commit a grave and serious error if we were to adopt so questionable a remedy as that. We should be equally unwise, in my judgment, if, because we disagree with the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court of the United States that a certain act of Congress is void because repugnant to the Constitution or because that court construed some other act of Congress differently from the way we would have construed it, we should deprive the court of its power or greatly cripple its power to declare those acts void which clearly violate the provisions of the Constitution. It is a matter of surprise that any reasonable and loyal citizen of the United States should propose the use of such revolutionary and destructive weapons as these. But suggestions of this kind are abroad in the land and must be met with courage by all who oppose them because they are dangerous and unsound. Everyone concedes that the decisions of the court should be and are open to the freest criticism. Judges are human, and to err is human. The judges as individuals are not entitled to special favor. They have not been set apart as more sacred than other human beings. The effect of fair and even sharp and merciless criticism of their decisions is wholesome. There is, however, a wide difference between free criticism of the courts and their decisions and the curtailment or destruction of the independence and vital power vested in them and necessary to the preservation of the Government itself. Some people do not seem to have discovered this truth. Abraham Lincoln criticized Chief Justice Taney and the decision of the court in the Dred Scott case unsparingly, but no man was more zealous than Mr. Lincoln in upholding each and every department of the Government created by the Constitution and in the preservation of the Union established by it, or who more firmly supported those canons of construction declared by Chief Justice Marshall.

You know what he said about his wish to save the Union without slavery if that could be done, but to save it even with slavery, and yet he is sometimes quoted as an authority to justify the attack upon the power of the court.

It is sometimes said that the Federal judges, holding office for life or during good behavior, are not subject to the will of the people, and that in our form of government no public officer should be entrusted with power who is not in some manner accountable to the people.

The Federal judges are accountable to the people. The Constitution was ordained by the people, and it provides that his tenure of office shall depend upon the good behavior of the judge, and that he may be impeached for wrongdoing. This makes him accountable to the people in the way which they themselves have provided in a Constitution which they ordained and established. So it is not true to say that these judges are not accountable to the people. If the method of procedure by which a bad judge may be impeached is too difficult, a way has been provided by which to amend that Constitution, and it should be resorted to for the purpose of adopting some easier and more effective method, but it should be by judicial inquiry and speedy trial with an opportunity to be heard, not a mere expression of public opinion after an excited and spectacular campaign for votes and by limiting the term of the judicial office to fixed periods of time. Mr. Hamilton correctly observed that the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights guaranteed by the Constitution. He said:

> The Executive not only dispenses the honors but holds the sword of the community. The legislature not only commands the purse but prescribes the rules by which the duties and rights of every citizen are to be regulated. * * * The judiciary may be said to have neither force nor will, but merely judgment. * * * Though individual oppression may now and then proceed from the courts of justice, the general liberty of the people can never be endangered from that quarter; I mean so long as the judiciary remains truly distinct from both the legislative and executive.

Hamilton was right. Judges can not take the initiative; they can not go into the forum and advocate political doctrines as partisans, as executive and legislative officers are permitted to do.

When attacked in the public press and on the platform by bitter partisans, when their decisions are assailed, the lips of the judges are closed. The dignity of the judicial office does not permit them to reply. They do not make issues; they decide only the questions that the parties before them have raised. As Mr. Hamilton has said, they have "neither force nor will, but merely judgment." The courts can not go out and seek, nor can they create controversies; they can simply hear and determine the issues brought before them and enter judgment. The enforcement of their decrees and writs follows because there is universal respect for the majesty of the law—not because the courts command fleets and armies. When the authorities of the State of Georgia refused to obey a writ of habeas corpus in the case of the Cherokee Nation against that State, President Jackson refused the aid of the Executive Department, and declared that "John Marshall has made his decision, now let him enforce it;" the Supreme Court of the United States was powerless to proceed further. Jackson, as the Chief Executive, held the Nation's sword and Congress controlled its purse, without their cooperation the court could go no further.

This fact in the history of the Supreme Court proves how idle are the fears of those who manifest concern lest the courts endanger the liberties of the people by an abuse of its power, and vindicates the statement of Mr. Hamilton that the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, is the least dangerous to the political rights guaranteed by the Constitution. Congress, and not the Federal courts, is to blame for the present situation in which those courts have been placed in suits brought to enforce the Sherman Antitrust Act. Without their seeking it, the burden and the duty have been put upon these courts of not only dissolving vast combinations in restraint of trade, such as the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co., and of permanently enjoining them from continuing in business and directing the division of their assets and the distribution thereof to shareholders in the several constituent and subsidiary corporations, but, in addition, the almost impossible task and the enormous responsibility have been put upon them of supervising, reviewing, directing, and consenting to some proposed plan under which several smaller concerns, owned chiefly by the same old stockholders, may severally and independently of each other conduct the vast business theretofore conducted by the unlawful combination.

If the Government is successful in the pending suits against the Harvester Trust and the Steel Trust, the courts will again be called upon to perform this task. It is work which no court should be asked to do. It properly belongs to some administrative tribunal. The nature and character of the work make it practically impossible for a court or judge to do it. It is put upon the courts because Congress has neglected to provide some other and more efficient method of regulation and restraint in the conduct of interstate business by corporations. The work which should be done by an administrative tribunal is forced upon the courts by the neglect of Congress to provide for such tribunal, and these courts are unjustly criticized for doing the best they can to render a service which, under no circumstances, should have been required of them. But a more efficient remedy will be provided soon, let us hope. The attention of the people is now directed to this problem, and they will not fail to find its solution. It is half solved when clearly and correctly stated. The point aimed at is special privilege. The American people have determined to destroy that. They have determined that the law shall not permit one class of citizens, as individuals or as corporations, to practice extortion or lay excessive burdens upon other citizens and make it harder for them to live; not only that the law shall not permit this thing, but that it shall go further and prevent this thing; that those in charge of the execution of the law shall enforce it. They have determined that special privilege shall be destroyed in this generation as slavery was destroyed in the last generation; that the wrongdoer, whether he be a malefactor of great wealth or a dynamiter pretending to represent organized labor, shall suffer the pains and penalties of the law; that special privilege shall be destroyed under the Constitution as it stands, or, if found necessary, that the Constitution shall be amended so as to permit it to be done.

In any event the die is cast. The personality, the iron will, and the resistless energy of an individual leader are only incidents—the issue is larger than the men engaged in the contest going on to settle it. The people have entered their decree. Because corporate wealth, amassed under special privilege, was not bearing its share of the public burden, Congress has already imposed an excise tax upon its right to transact interstate business, based upon net earnings. Because those who receive enormous incomes—far beyond their needs and the needs of those dependent upon them—do not bear their share of the expenses of maintaining the Government, and because that burden falls too heavily upon the man of small means—least able to bear it—the people will soon ratify the proposed amendment giving clear and unquestioned power to Congress to levy a tax upon incomes.

The people are also determined that the transmission of great inheritances shall be made to pay a toll to the Government under whose protection they are accumulated, thereby removing to some extent the burden now borne upon the backs of the poor. They are also determined that the general welfare, and not special interests, shall be the governing motive in determining the amount which shall be raised by duties on imports and the extent to which such duties shall protect the American market place.

More and more it is becoming necessary to invoke the use of the powers granted by our Federal Constitution to Congress in the solution of the growing problems which arise in our complex industrial and commercial life. These problems can not be solved by the States, because they are interstate problems.

Under modern conditions commerce knows no State lines. Yet many of the States, by unwise and improvident statutes, have permitted the organization of companies which, without restraint by the laws creating them, have proceeded to prey upon the people in all the States through the avenues of interstate commerce. They have allowed companies to be organized for any sort of business without reference to where it is to be carried on and without any limitation upon the capitalization; the charters granted are perpetual or may be renewed over and over again; consolidations and mergers are permitted; ownership in the stock of competing corporations may be acquired without limit; there is no requirement that any part of the capital shall be paid before the corporation begins business or afterwards; stock may be issued for property and for service and labor, the value of which may be arbitrarily fixed by the board of directors; the meetings of directors and of stockholders may be held beyond the limits of the State; no official report to the State is required; directors are not required to be residents of the State, and the same person may act as a director in two or more companies engaged in the same kind of business.

All the States do not grant all these privileges, but most of them are permitted by the majority, and none of them is prohibited in all.

It is under these lax State laws that trusts and combinations are formed which seek to monopolize and restrain trade and commerce between the States. It is very clear that the only adequate remedy we can hope for must be obtained from the Federal Government by the exercise of its power to regulate commerce between the States. As the Interstate Commerce Commission has brought the railroads engaged in interstate commerce under control, so should an administrative commission of the Federal Government bring all these industrial and commercial concerns engaged in interstate commerce under the control of the Federal Government. It should be complete and effective control based upon the firm purpose to protect the American people from the unjust burdens of special privilege and monopoly. Ours is a representative government. It is only representative in the true sense when the agencies selected by the people give expression to the well wrought out and temperate conclusions of the people. The man in public life who closes his ears to the appeals of the masses and listens only to the demands of those who seek for some personal and selfish advantage through the agencies of the Government is an enemy of representative government.

It is to dislodge him that more effective methods of securing the execution of the popular will, such as the direct primary, the initiative, and the referendum are devised; it is not for the purpose of changing the Republic into a pure democracy, but for the purpose of placing effective weapons of defense against special privilege in the hands of the people to be used when the emergency requires. As a weapon in reserve to be used only when regularly chosen representatives have been guilty of a betrayal of their trust these innovations are a useful and wholesome restraint. Back of them all are the good sense and the permanent devotion of the American people to the principles of justice.

Mr. President, my view of these questions relating to the Federal judiciary is that along with perhaps some more effective remedy in the nature of impeachment, but still more simple and effective, we should be able to get rid of an unfaithful judge of one of these inferior Federal courts by having his term end some time; and that is the purpose I have in view in suggesting this amendment to the Constitution, fixing the tenure of the judges of these courts at terms of 10 years.

I ask that the joint resolution which I have presented and which is now on the table be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I earnestly hope that the members of that committee will give it most serious consideration with a view to taking action upon it at some day within a reasonable limit of time.

I thank the Senate for its indulgence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 18642, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Perkins
Bacon	Culberson	Kern	Pomerene
Borah	Cullom	Lea	Rayner
Bourne	Cummins	Lippitt	Reed
Bradley	Curtis	Lodge	Richardson
Brandegee	Dillingham	McCumber	Root
Bristow	Fall	McLean	Sanders
Bryan	Fletcher	Myers	Shively
Burnham	Gallinger	Nelson	Simmons
Burton	Guggenheim	Nixon	Smith, Ga.
Catron	Heyburn	Oliver	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Overman	Sutherland
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Works

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] has been called from the Chamber on account of public business.

Mr. JONES. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is detained from the Senate by important public business.

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was called out on important business temporarily, but will soon be in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, before proceeding to the discussion of the measure before the Senate I want to say a few words of a personal nature. While the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was addressing the Senate upon this bill the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] made a statement concerning something that I was supposed to have said during the course of that debate. The language of the Senator from Missouri was as follows—I read from the RECORD:

> Mr. REED. The statement was made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, who ought to be as well informed as the Senator from Utah upon the cost of iron and steel, because he comes from one of the great iron and steel producing States of the country. The statement was to the effect that the testimony two years ago was now utterly unreliable, because the cost has changed in the two years so greatly that the testimony of two years ago could no longer be used as a basis for determining to-day the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home.

Mr. President, I never in the Senate or elsewhere made any such statement. The Senator from Missouri, either for want of sufficient attention to what was said misunderstood something that I did say, which I can not understand, or possibly something may have been said by another Senator which the Senator from Missouri mistakenly attributed to me.

I am a little careful, Mr. President, about statements of fact that I make, particularly with regard to conditions in the iron and steel business, with which I have all my life been somewhat familiar. I am disposed to resent the action of the Senator in attributing to me statements which I never uttered and which I not only never uttered, but which are without any basis of fact, because the conditions in the iron and steel trade to-day do not differ materially from what they were two years ago. In addition to which, I never, directly or indirectly, intimated that the testimony taken two years ago was unreliable; and I am at a loss to understand how the Senator from Missouri could attribute such a statement to me. I want to say here that I cheerfully acquit the Senator from Missouri of any intention to misrepresent me, but he has unwittingly done so, and I take this opportunity of placing myself right upon the record.

Mr. President, the platform of the Republican Party adopted at Chicago in 1908 contained the following words:

> The Republican Party declares unequivocally for a revision of the tariff by a special session of Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President, and commends the step already taken to this end in the work assigned to the appropriate committees of Congress, which are now investigating the operation and effect of existing schedules. In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

This declaration has been the subject of much discussion, and it has been strenuously contended by the advocates of low duties that it meant nothing but a revision downward. For my part I have never been able to see that this plank was intended to be anything else than a firm and emphatic declaration in favor of a continuance of that protective policy which has been favored by the Republican Party from the day of its birth, and has been the chief cause of its many victories. It is probably true that in the minds of many of our people the change in conditions from those prevailing in 1897 seemed to warrant a reduction of duties in many of the schedules, but that the majority of the Republican voters in 1908 expected or wished for such a reduction as to enable foreign producers to compete in our markets with our own products I do not believe.

The law of 1909, which is now in force, was enacted in response to this tariff declaration, and was looked upon by its friends as a fulfillment of that promise. Whatever may be said of other schedules, no man who reads the schedule now under consideration and compares it with the law which preceded it can fail to acknowledge that in this schedule at least the revision was radically downward; for almost every item it contains carries a lower duty than the corresponding item in the Dingley law, and on many of them the duty was practically cut in two. It is strange, therefore, and utterly illogical that the first schedule selected for further downward revision by this Congress should be the one that was confessedly cut the lowest in the law enacted only three years ago, and this in spite of the fact that the Tariff Board, created by Congress for the express purpose of obtaining information concerning the cost of production at home and abroad, has reported its findings concerning two other important schedules, while it has not yet concluded its investigations as to Schedule C.

Mr. President, as a Republican and a protectionist I stand upon the platform declared by my party four years ago. I voted for the laws creating the Tariff Board and enlarging its powers and duties. I am ready to vote for a revision of all schedules just as fast as the Tariff Board furnishes us with the necessary information concerning them. Having created this board we should at least postpone action until the board furnishes us with the information necessary to form our conclusions. They have already reported on two schedules, and I contend that we should at least dispose of these schedules before we proceed to the consideration of others. This is the only logical position for a Republican and a protectionist to take.

I am opposed to this bill, because I do not believe it was conceived in good faith, or that it was ever intended to become a law. I have confidence enough in the patriotism of our Democratic friends to think that if they really believed that what they propose would be finally enacted they would never submit a measure so illy thought out and so full of menace to the greatest of our industries as this; and I venture to predict that if the entire responsibility of government ever comes to them, the measure they finally adopt will be far different and far less burdensome than the one now before us.

The great difficulty about this bill is that its proponents in reality have no kind of understanding about the subject in hand. The bill itself shows how little they understood the task that was assigned them. When they think of the steel industry they see nothing before them but the United States Steel Corporation. They forget that, while the steel corporation looms large in the public mind and while it originates nearly one-half of the tonnage of steel produced in the United States, its business amounts in dollars and cents to less than a fourth part of the total value of the country's steel products. They also forget that while the bill proposes large reductions in the duties imposed upon the heavier steels, which are produced by the steel corporation, it hits still harder the man who with a small factory works the steel down into the smaller shapes and sizes which it takes when it goes to the ultimate consumer. I am speaking now of the bill as it came from the House. Later on I will have something to say of the substitute measure proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

As I have said, in their desire to weaken the steel corporation the fathers of this bill have lost sight of the man with the small shop and of the men whom he employs, but at the same time they are playing directly into the hands of the trust at which the measure is aimed. This bill in reality should be entitled "An act to confirm and perpetuate the power and dominance of the United States Steel Corporation in the steel business of the United States," for if we follow the arguments of those who have spoken in favor of this measure and of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa to their logical conclusion, that corporation can survive its enactment, while many of its competitors must perish.

The Senator from Iowa, in his speech delivered some days ago, demonstrated to his own satisfaction that steel rails could be produced from pig iron at a labor cost of $1.86 per ton. The Senator's statement was based upon a report furnished by the Commissioner of Corporations, and I admit that, except that he allows nothing for waste in conversion, which amounts to considerable, his statement is borne out by what is contained in that report. That there is some flaw in it, I am absolutely certain. What it is, I confess that I can not discover. But I do not hesitate to say that, given a plant with the most modern equipment, with unlimited capital, and with every advantage known to modern times, if the Senator from Iowa or any other man would ever attempt to manufacture steel rails upon the basis of that report he would go bankrupt within six months.

There is but one isolated plant in the United States whose only finished product is steel rails, and that is the Edgar Thomson Steel Works at Braddock, near Pittsburgh. Feeling certain that there was something wrong with the Senator's statement, I asked the officials of the Steel Corporation, to which the works belong, for a statement of the pay roll of the Edgar Thomson works for some given period, and also for the tonnage of rails manufactured during that period, and I received in reply the statement that during the calendar year 1910 the total pay roll of the Edgar Thomson works was $3,301,031; deducting from this the amount paid for labor for and on account of pig iron produced in excess of that used for rails and all other products produced other than in the manufacture of rails, $978,000, leaves a balance of pay roll, including labor going into the manufacture of rails, of $2,323,031. There was produced during the year 460,000 tons of rails. On the basis of the amount of pay roll as above applicable to this production the average labor per ton of rails would be $5.05. According to the report of the Commissioner of Corporations the labor cost in producing a ton of pig iron is 77 cents. Deducting this from the above would leave the cost of labor entering into the conversion of a ton of pig iron into rails $4.28. Now, I give this statement simply as it was given to me. There may be something wrong about it, but I am certain that it is very much nearer the mark than the amount allowed by the Senator from Iowa.

I have listened with great interest to the argument of the Senator from Iowa, and I am free to confess that I agree with some of the conclusions he draws as applied to the Steel Corporation. There is no doubt whatever that so far as the corporation itself is concerned it would suffer but little from a reduction of duties on some of the heavier products it manufactures, and there is also no question but that it has an enormous advantage over many of its competitors and a considerable advantage over all of them in the manufacture of what is known as tonnage steel. It produces all of the ore and practically all of the coke which goes to its blast furnaces. I do not think this is true of any one of its competitors. It transports its own ore to the Lakes and a large part of it from the Lakes to its furnaces, an advantage enjoyed by no one else. Its plants are located in different parts of the country, so that it can deliver its products to all points at much less expense than those with single plants, thereby entailing a great saving in freight; and what is greater than all, its unlimited financial resources would enable it to survive a fierce competitive war, which would overwhelm individual manufacturers with disaster. So that while this bill, if enacted, will subject the steel corporation to foreign competition in many of its products, in the end it would probably survive, while most of its competitors would perish.

Mr. President, in the discussion of this measure I want to be absolutely fair; and in a spirit of fairness I admit that, so far as the United States Steel Corporation and perhaps one or two of its greater competitors are concerned, they have little to fear from this bill. In fact, the steel corporation officials are looking with great complacency upon this proposed legislation. I have seen none of them about Washington to oppose it, as was the case three years ago. If enacted, it will undoubtedly take away from them some, at least, of the markets which they now control; but at the same time it will force such a reduction in prices as to drive their smaller competitors out of business and give them that monopoly which from the first they have aimed at. With their integrated profits and their enormous resources they can drive the individual from the field. Having done this, they can and will arrange with the foreign syndicates for a division of the world's markets. This is no dream. It has happened before, and it will happen again. The whole steel business abroad is syndicate controlled, and the managers of the syndicates will be only too ready to join with the few who will then control the American market for the exploitation of the American people.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that the reports show that the Steel Trust, so-called, is doing a decreasing percentage of the total steel business in the United States——

Mr. OLIVER. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That year by year it is losing to its smaller competitors?

Mr. OLIVER. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, if that be true, how can the Senator justify the statement he has just made as to their superior opportunities and advantages?

Mr. OLIVER. It is very easily explained, Mr. President. The policy of the United States Steel Corporation since its organization has been a very liberal one toward its competitors. It has followed the policy of sustaining the market rather than driving out competition. The very able men who control it have figured that it is much better for them to reap large profits and allow independent manufacturers to do the same than to exercise that power which they undoubtedly have of driving not perhaps all but many of their competitors out of the field.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania further yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Which means that the Steel Trust has pursued a policy of maintaining prices at such an exorbitant figure that not only is it able to make large profits, as the Senator says, upon the business it does, but its other competitors by its grace are enabled with their deficient resources also to make profits—all this at the expense of the American consumer under the protection of the American tariff.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska proposes to suggest that as my opinion I take issue with his conclusion. I will say that so far as my observation goes I would eliminate the word "exorbitant." I do not think that the prices charged for steel during the past 10 years could reasonably be called exorbitant. They have been such as to afford to a manufacturer with the advantages that the steel corporation has very large profits. There is no gainsaying that fact. Also I think many of its competitors have had very considerable profits. That it has been done at the expense of the American people I doubt very much. I believe, on the whole, taking the average of the 10 years, the consumers of iron and steel and iron and steel products have not paid more for what they bought than they would have done under competitive conditions, for the reason that during periods of scarcity prices have not gone up to the same extent that they did when there was unquestioned competition amongst manufacturers. In other words, the steel corporation has endeavored to maintain prices at a level. Some may call it a high level, and I am rather disposed to concede that, but it has been at a level, and they have prevented violent fluctuation upward as well as downward. That, I think, is a very fair statement of conditions.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OLIVER. With pleasure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator, then, to say that under the present arrangement provided by the steel corporation the independents are not subject to competition.

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, no; I did not say that at all, Mr. President. I did not say anything about independents. I have not mentioned the word "independent." If the Senator from North Carolina desires to quote me, I want him to quote what I said, not what he thinks I might have said under certain conditions.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, I will ask the Senator if the meaning of his statement is not that there is not under present conditions any competition in this country in the steel industry?

Mr. OLIVER. I said nothing from which that meaning could be taken.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, I will ask the Senator if there is competition in prices in this country in the steel and iron industry?

Mr. OLIVER. There is at present, Mr. President. I would not term it fierce competition, but there is very hearty competition amongst all manufacturers. I do not believe that to-day——

Mr. SIMMONS. I was asking with reference to prices—if there is any competition in prices.

Mr. OLIVER. I am talking about prices. There could be no competition in the true sense if there was no competition in prices. If there is no competition in prices, there is no competition in anything.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt of it. I am trying to reach the point of the question I wish to ask the Senator. It is whether there is any competition in prices; that is to say, whether the prices that are arbitrarily fixed by the steel corporation are not the same prices charged by all the other steel manufacturers in this country?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, that is a very frank question. So far as my observation goes I state that I think there is fair and open competition to-day between the steel corporation and all its competitors. As far as I can observe the situation, that is the case.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator mean to say that they charge different prices for the same article?

Mr. OLIVER. I should like the Senator to elaborate that question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Take any of the basic products—steel rails, for instance. Is there any difference between the price which the steel corporation charges for steel rails and the price other manufacturers of steel rails charge in this country?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know anything about the steel-rail market, but I have had something to do within recent times with the purchase of other material. I have had something to do with the purchase of structural material, and I found a difference in the prices quoted by the steel corporation and its competitors, and a very considerable difference at that.

Of course, Mr. President, any man who has been engaged in the business knows, and those who have not been engaged in the business can easily understand, that where people are doing a competitive business prices will sooner or later seek the same level, because a man engaged in business, whether manufacturing or merchandising, finds out almost in a moment what his competitor is doing and he immediately proceeds to meet it. So if the Senator from North Carolina were about to put up a steel building and would ask for bids, while he would find a considerable variation in the bids, as a general proposition the variation would cover a very limited range, because these men have their salesmen and representatives out and it is their business all the time to find what their competitors are doing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator says there has been no difference in the price charged by the steel corporation and other manufacturers of steel rails.

Mr. OLIVER. It is common report that the price of steel rails is practically uniform. I have no doubt that is the case

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says there is a difference in the price of structural steel.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; and all great lines of steel.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if that is a substantial difference or is it just a slight difference?

Mr. OLIVER. Now, Mr. President, the Senator knows just as much about that as I do, because I have not come into personal contact with the business. I have not had occasion within recent months to buy anything or to be connected with any interest that was buying anything in that line, and I can not answer that question any more than the Senator from North Carolina can.

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked the Senator the question because, coming from the State of Pennsylvania, I supposed that he had great familiarity with these matters. I understood him to say in the beginning of his speech that practically all of his life he had had some familiarity with the iron and steel industry.

Mr. OLIVER. I have had.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I knew that the Senator would make a frank statement about it, and, I thought, a statement based upon knowledge. So I was anxious to find out whether or not, in the Senator's knowledge, the difference which he says exists in the price of structural iron and steel and some other products was a substantial difference or merely a slight variation in price?

Mr. OLIVER. I understand, Mr. President, that for a year past, perhaps more, there has been active and earnest competition amongst steel manufacturers, not only on structural steel but upon all other lines of iron and steel. I do not know whether or not that extends to rails, but I do not believe it does.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the general impression is that there has been very little domestic competition in prices of any of the basic products of steel and iron in this country. The Senator says, however, that there is some in certain products.

Mr. OLIVER. I know that there is very active competition in pig iron.

Mr. SIMMONS. Following that statement, I understood the Senator to say that if this bill should pass the steel corporation would be able to survive, and I understood him to say further that they would be likely to enter into combinations or arrangements with foreign syndicates, and in that way keep up the price.

Mr. OLIVER. What I said, Mr. President, was that, in my opinion, after having exercised the power which they would have if protection were taken away from their competitors of decreasing the number of those competitors, they would then be in a position to enter into arrangements with foreign syndicates for the control not only of the markets of this country but of the markets of the world.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, I ask the Senator what harm could come, if that is so, to the independents or other manufacturers who fear prices will be reduced by the result of this bill, if, in case it should pass, the steel corporation should make, and probably would make, such arrangements with foreign competitors as to prevent any such result following the passage of the measure?

Mr. OLIVER. No harm would come to them, except that they would be out of business; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I should like to ask the Senator how would they be put out of business if the steel corporation made these arrangements with foreign competitors, so that prices would be maintained in this country, notwithstanding the reduction of the tariff?

Mr. OLIVER. Because the steel corporation, by exercising the power which the Senator from North Carolina and his compatriots in their good will toward the corporation would give them, would have driven their smaller competitors out of business; and once out of business it is a very hard thing to get back again.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator mean that the steel corporation would not make this arrangement with the foreign syndicates to maintain prices in this country until they had first destroyed the independents?

Mr. OLIVER. I mean that the steel corporation would make their arrangements with whomsoever was competing with them, and by that time, by reason of the reduced duties which the Senator proposes, their competitors would not be the ones at home, but those abroad, represented by the German and English syndicates.

Mr. SIMMONS. But that arrangement, to be effective and to accomplish the purpose that the steel corporation would have in view in making it, would have to be an arrangement by which the foreign producer would keep out of this market.

Mr. OLIVER. Very likely; but leave that to the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. How long does the Senator think it would take the United States Steel Corporation to make that arrangement?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the United States Steel Corporation holds a charter which runs perpetually, and I am only outlining what I think would happen under this most vicious legislation, which is advocated by the Senator from North Carolina. I may be wrong in my prognostications. I am saying what I think and what I believe; and if unfortunately this legislation be enacted, I hope that I shall turn out to be a poor prophet.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania mean, in comparing the United States Steel Corporation with the other companies engaged in the same business, that if the steel corporation were to be content with the same profits that are enjoyed by the independent companies it could very materially, very largely, reduce the price of its products?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, if the steel corporation—and I think the Senator from Iowa will acknowledge that this is correct—were content with the same measure of profits that is enjoyed by the ordinary independent manufacturer, the ordinary independent manufacturer would not be in business.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that the ordinary manufacturer, or independent manufacturer, lives at the will of the United States Steel Corporation, and the latter is willing that its so-called rivals shall live, because the United States Steel Corporation thinks it is better to take a very large profit on half of the business than to excite the indignation of the people by absorbing all the business. That is about the situation, is it not?

Mr. OLIVER. Divesting the Senator's language of some of its phraseology, Mr. President, it is pretty nearly a good statement of the case, in my opinion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only wanted to remind the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has up to this time treated the subject very frankly, that in the costs which I gave the other day of producing the various commodities with which I dealt, I did not take the costs of the United States Steel Corporation alone.

Mr. OLIVER. I understand that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I took the average of costs of all the companies engaged in the business. The Senator from Pennsylvania recognizes that, I believe?

Mr. OLIVER. I understand; yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. One other thing, and I will not interrupt the Senator more at this time. The Senator from Pennsylvania began his speech by the suggestion that there was in 1909 a very great reduction in the duties of the metal schedule. I hope that before he has finished he will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, although there was a great reduction in some of the items of the metal schedule, as a whole the metal schedule was reduced, I think, a little less than 1 per cent. So that the Senator may have that in mind, I will read from a publication prepared by the Senate Committee on Finance in 1909, in which, referring to Schedule C, being metals and manufactures thereof, it is said that the average duty, reduced to an ad valorem, under the Dingley law was 32.59 per cent—that is, upon imports for the previous year; that the average duty of the bill as it passed the Senate was 32.13 per cent; that the average duty of the conference bill, which was adopted by the Senate as well as by the House, was 31.35 per cent, about three-fourths of 1 per cent reduction, taking the schedule as a whole.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OLIVER. I will yield to the Senator from Utah in a moment.

Mr. President, the percentage of reduction in duties is not to be measured by the percentage of reduction in the different articles which happen to have been imported. A great many of the items in the iron and steel schedule are manufactured exclusively in the United States and are not the subject of import duties at all. Very large reductions were made in those articles, which do not show in the report cited by the Senator from Iowa. With regard to that I will say that if you take the schedule item by item and show the percentage of reduction or increase in the different items there will be found a very different showing from that contained in the report of the imports. Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to respond to the suggestion just made by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognize the accuracy of the statement just made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. It corroborates precisely what I said the other day when I was trying to convince the Senate of the fallacy of an argument which was then being made by the Senator from Utah. For instance, under the Dingley law—as we have spoken of steel rails I will mention them—the duty on steel rails in the paragraph containing rails was $7.84 a ton, and during the year of 1908, preceding the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, the imports of commodities under that paragraph bearing a duty on steel rails of $7.84 a ton and upon fishplates of $10 a ton, were in value about $450,000. In 1909 we reduced the duty on steel rails to $3.92 per ton and upon fishplates and the like to $6 per ton, and in 1910 the imports of those commodities, under this duty cut in two, were only about $100,000. So one could easily see that the lower the duty the less will be the import upon the same theory that some of my friends reduce specific duties to ad valorems.

Mr. OLIVER. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not follow the logic of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], nor do I think the Senator's comparison is a fair one. I desire to call the Senator's attention to a fact, and, after I do so, I believe he will agree with me. The comparison that he has made is made upon the amount of importations in a certain year—I believe the year 1908. The comparison would be reliable provided the imports were exactly the same in amount.

Now, let me illustrate: If there were no imports at all, we could have cut the duty from 100 per cent to 1 per cent, and in the comparison offered by the Senator no difference whatever would be shown. The comparisons I gave the other day in relation to transferring a specific duty to an equivalent ad valorem duty were upon actual importations, not as compared with any other year, but for the particular year of those importations. So, Mr. President, if I had compared them with the same amount of importations under the rate the Senator may have proposed then, of course, the comparison would have shown exactly what the difference was as to the items; but if there had been no importations at all, then the comparison of the whole schedule, as the Senator is doing here, would not give an accurate idea of the reductions; in other words, Mr. President—and I believe the Senator will bear me out in this statement—steel rails and many other items, such as bar iron, were reduced 50 per cent, and a great quantity of the heavy steel products were reduced from 25 to 50 per cent, but there were no importations of them.

Mr. CUMMINS. And have been none since.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit, Mr. President, that there have been none since, and because of that fact a comparison of the equivalent ad valorem duties of the tariff act of 1909 and the duties proposed by the Senator would not show the result at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah is expressing in a better way just precisely what I said at a former time. When he attempts to take a whole bracket, comprising a half dozen commodities or the same commodity divided into classes by price, and attempts to convert a specific duty upon that bracket or those commodities into an ad valorem, it is an impossibility, and it must necessarily be inaccurate. I only wanted to show that, taking the whole metal schedule as passed in 1909, and applying it to the importations of the previous year, there was a reduction, converted into ad valorems, of less than 1 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, if there had been no importations at all——

Mr. OLIVER. There would not have been any reduction shown.

Mr. SMOOT. If there had been no importations at all on the items on which the duty was reduced, then, according to the Senator's logic, there would have been no reduction of the ad valorem duties at all; but, of course, we can plainly see that that would not be the case. As to the question that we were discussing the other day in relation to the brackets, putting two or three of them together and finding the equivalent ad valorem duty, the Senator's contention in that regard would be absolutely true, providing we did not know just exactly what the shipments were, the unit value of the shipments, and the amount of duty collected. With those items known, then without question the difference between the equivalent ad valorems can be ascertained.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the Senator from Iowa will acknowledge that the ratio of the reduction or the increase in duties in Schedule C is not necessarily to be measured by what the import records show. While I have never made it the subject of examination or study, my own impression is that the average reduction in duties in this schedule under the act of 1909 was not less than 20 per cent. I may be wide of the mark, but that is my impression. I am very glad to see, Mr. President, that there is some chance of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Utah getting together.

Mr. President, I join with many other thoughtful Americans in deploring the fact that so great a proportion of this, our greatest industry, has been concentrated into one management. I would much prefer to see the steel business as it once was, under the eye of the old ironmaster, who lived near his plant and spent his days and nights in watching its development—who came into daily contact with the men he employed and had a stake in the community in which he lived. In what may be termed "the greater steel industry" the old ironmaster is but a reminiscence. His place has been taken by the high-class hired man, who acts under the direction of the financier; but in the finishing trades and the lighter lines, which involve thousands of plants instead of scores, and whose business aggregates many times that of the steel corporation, the individual proprietor still stands at the helm, and it is at him that this legislation is aimed and in his defense that I now speak.

Having said this much about the bill in a general way, I will now take up a few of the more glaring of the many mistakes it contains and which show the utter incompetency of the hands that framed it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Dillingham	Lea	Pomerene
Bailey	du Pont	McCumber	Rayner
Borah	Fall	Martine, N. J.	Reed
Bourne	Fletcher	Myers	Richardson
Bradley	Foster	Nelson	Sanders
Bryan	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Shively
Burnham	Gronna	Oliver	Simmons
Burton	Guggenheim	Overman	Smith, Ariz.
Chilton	Hitchcock	Paynter	Smith, Mich.
Cummins	Johnston, Ala.	Penrose	Smoot
Curtis	Jones	Perkins	Sutherland

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was called from the Chamber temporarily on public business.

I also desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is temporarily detained from the Chamber on important business. I desire that this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. OLIVER. I will first refer to the article called ferromanganese.

Now, ferromanganese is an alloy used in the manufacture of steel. It is made in a blast furnace, in precisely the same manner as pig iron. It is, in fact, nothing but pig iron of a very high class. Owing to the scarcity of manganiferous ores in the United States most, if not all, of these ores are imported from abroad. Ferromanganese is manufactured in this country by just one concern, and that concern is the United States Steel Corporation. In the Payne bill the duty levied on ferromanganese is the same as on pig iron—$2.50 per ton. The framers of the Underwood bill reduced the duty on pig iron to 8 per cent ad valorem, amounting to about 90 cents per ton; but for some reason which passes human comprehension they place a duty on ferromanganese of 15 per cent, which amounts at the market price to-day to about $6 per ton. So that out of abundance of love for the United States Steel Corporation they have advanced the duty on this article, of which it is the only American manufacturer, from $2.50 to $6 per ton. There is only one explanation for this amazing provision, and that is that the framers of the bill did not know what they were doing. The Senator from Iowa knew too much to be led into this ambush, and his bill places the duty at $1 per ton on both pig iron and ferromanganese. For my part I see no reason why ferromanganese should not be admitted free of duty. The ore which forms the basis of its raw material comes from abroad, and it can only be made here under difficulties which are almost prohibitory. If any duty is imposed for revenue purposes, it should under no circumstances be higher than that which now prevails.

BAR IRON.

Thirty years ago, before it was supplanted by soft steel made by the Bessemer and open-hearth processes, bar iron was the basis of iron manufacture the world over. It should not be confounded with bar steel; it is a different article, made in a different way, and used largely for different purposes. Steel is made by melting the pig iron and casting it into ingots, while iron is made by reducing it to only a semimolten state, squeezing out the impurities, rolling it into a flat bar called muck bar, which is then allowed to cool, sheared up into small pieces, reheated, and rerolled into what is known commercially as bar iron. Steel is granular in its texture, while iron is fibrous. In its process of manufacture iron is made to-day in precisely the same manner as it was 50 years ago. The labor is all hand labor. Machinery has not supplanted it as it has in the manufacture of soft steel, and the wages paid for such labor in this country are uniformly just about double those paid in Europe. As an example, we find from Mr. Pepper's report that the maximum weekly wages at Dusseldorf for puddlers is $13.68. In this country puddlers are paid by the ton, and the present wage scale of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers calls for the payment of $5.37½ per ton for puddling. The product of a puddling furnace is 2,800 pounds, or 1¼ gross tons, per working day. The puddler's wages would therefore amount to $6.72 per day. Out of this, under the workingmen's scale, he pays to a helper one-third plus 5 per cent of his own two-thirds. Figuring the day's wages on this basis, the puddler in the United States would receive $4.25 per day, while the man who performs the same work at Dusseldorf receives $13.68 per week, or $2.28 per day—a difference between the two countries of $1.97 per day. It will be noted that in this country the puddler's helper receives $2.47 per day, or 19 cents more than the daily wage of the German puddler. I have not the detailed information which will enable me to analyze the wages of the other workers in the mill, but I am satisfied that they will bear the same proportion to each other as in the case of the puddler. The labor performed in each case is identical and there is no material difference in the equipment of the mills. Wrought iron is made in substantially the same way the world over. It is largely the product of manual labor, while in the manufacture of soft steel the man is only an incident and machinery performs most of the work.

Mr. James Lord, an iron manufacturer of Lebanon, Pa., testified before the Finance Committee of the Senate as follows:

> I am representing to-day, in company with eight gentlemen who have come from different parts of the East, 25 rolling mills that manufacture bar iron east of the Allegheny Mountains and that stretch from Knoxville, Tenn., to Portland, Me. These companies sell their products for the most part east of the mountains and largely to the Atlantic coast and Gulf points. Consequently this bill, if passed, would put the burden of foreign competition largely on these eastern mills, because the freight from our different mills to coast points is just about equivalent to the freight from European competing points. For instance, our freight to New York would be 10 cents, while practically the same rate could be obtained from Liverpool or from Antwerp.

The duty in the Payne bill on bar iron is three-tenths of 1 cent per pound, or $6 per net ton. The Underwood bill reduces this to 10 per cent ad valorem. The Cummins amendment places the duty at $3.50 per ton on square bars and $3.75 per ton on round; but I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that in the latter clause, relating to round iron, he has inserted the word "steel," which might be construed as admitting round steel of high carbon and high value, which I do not think he intended to do. I have no hesitation in saying that the enactment of the Underwood bill into law would utterly destroy the mills turning out this product east of the Allegheny Mountains, and most of this iron is made in eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New England. The mills west of the mountains to a very large extent have abandoned the manufacture of iron and work exclusively on steel. And I further say that none of this iron is turned out at any of the plants of the great steel-producing companies. So far as I am aware, not a ton of it is made in any of the plants of the steel corporation, the Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., the Republic Iron & Steel Co., the Cambria Steel Co., nor, as I believe, in any other of the great plants.

But the most glaring case of injustice to a deserving industry, that to-day is literally struggling for life, occurs in paragraph 9 of the Underwood bill, corresponding to paragraph 131 of the Payne law, commonly known as the basket clause. Of all branches of the iron and steel industry the most difficult one to establish in the United States has been the manufacture of the finer grades of steel known as crucible cast steel. Since Huntsmen, of Sheffield, discovered the art of making crucible steel, in 1740, that city has been known as the center of the industry and has been noted the world over for the excellence of its product. It retains that supremacy to-day.

It was, I believe, more than a century later before any attempts to produce this kind of steel were made in the United States, and the pioneers in these attempts went down to repeated failures. By degrees, however, the American manufacturers obtained a foothold in this business, and for years preceding 1900 a very large part of the crucible steel—otherwise known as tool steel—used in this country was of home manufacture. But about 1900 or 1901 there appeared on the market a new product of English manufacture known as high-speed steel. It was so named because, owing to its peculiar composition, a tool made of this steel retains its temper even when red hot, so that the machine in which it is placed can be rushed at a high rate of speed instead of very slowly, with the result that the machine is capable of turning out many times as much work in the same time and with the same labor as it would when the ordinary steel was used. This steel was sold at first at 75 cents per pound and was cheaper at that price than the ordinary steel would be at even one-tenth of the price, as it outlasted the other and enabled a given machine to turn out an enormously greater quantity of work with the same amount of labor. The introduction of this steel threatened to destroy the industry in the United States. Its merit was so apparent and its introduction into this country was so rapid that the imports of fine steel, valued above 16 cents a pound, the highest classification known to the Dingley law, which in 1898 had amounted to only 250,540 pounds, in 1901 reached 778,736 pounds; in 1902 jumped to 2,133,461 pounds; in 1903, 2,299,239 pounds; in 1904, 1,550,313 pounds; in 1905, 1,724,612 pounds; in 1906, 2,897,682 pounds; in 1907, 3,535,707 pounds; in 1908, 1,999,255 pounds; and in 1909, 2,083,672 pounds; and I may add that, notwithstanding the very liberal increase in duty allowed by the Payne law, the imports during 1911 were 2,870,267 pounds.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. As I understand the Senator, this is a particular kind of steel out of which machinery is made to work exclusively in iron and steel.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; generally for that purpose. Its use has since been extended to the making of cutlery and other articles of that sort.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator says that the process of making this particular kind of steel is an English process.

Mr. OLIVER. Originally it was a secret process.

Mr. SHIVELY. A secret process?

Mr. OLIVER. When invented or discovered. It first made its appearance in 1901 or thereabouts, and if the Senator will follow the figures I have given he will see that it has made very rapid progress.

Mr. SHIVELY. The figures are of the imports?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. None of it was made in this country at the beginning.

Mr. SHIVELY. Those imports were induced by reason of the superior quality of the steel for this particular purpose.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. It was used in this country in the general iron and steel industry.

Mr. OLIVER. It was used in this country, yes; by all users of fine steel.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is, it was used in this country in the manufacture of machinery for use in the iron and steel industry.

Mr. OLIVER. Generally speaking; yes.

In the meantime, however, the American crucible steel manufacturers discovered the formula or mixture which was employed in producing this steel. It is composed of a mixture of the best class of Swedish bars, with about 18 to 20 per cent of tungsten, about 3½ per cent of chromium, and 1 per cent of vanadium. The tungsten enables the steel to retain its temper while at a red heat, while chromium imparts toughness and vanadium greater tensile strength and greater resistance to strains and shocks. The combination produces a steel of which one pound will do as much work as five or ten times its weight of any steel that was known fifteen years ago. The first effect of the American competition was to bring down the price of the English steel from 75 cents a pound to about 40 cents, at which price the home manufacturers could not compete, owing to the great additional labor involved in its manufacture and the expensive nature of the materials used.

As a result of the showing they made, the duty upon this grade of steel was advanced by the Payne bill on a sliding scale, based upon an ad valorem of about 20 per cent, and I am proud of the fact that I was to some degree at least instrumental in obtaining this advance. When the amendment proposing it was offered by the chairman of the Finance Committee it raised at once a storm of protest. Some of the Senators here will remember the debate that ensued. But so convincing were the facts that upon a fair presentation of the case the amendment was carried without a division. Since the act of 1909, notwithstanding the advance in duty, the American manufacturers have been barely able to hold their own. That the duty imposed by the present law is not too high to allow reasonable competition from abroad is shown by the increase of imports from $2,083,672 in 1909 to $2,870,267 in 1911.

I tried to get the imports for 1910, but was unable to do so. To give some idea of the nature of this business, and of the kind of men who are engaged in it, I will quote from the testimony of Mr. William Metcalf, jr., president of the Braeburn Steel Co., of Braeburn, near Pittsburgh. Mr. Metcalf, whom I know very well, inherited this business from his father, the founder, one of the pioneers in this branch of the industry. His plant is a small one, owned entirely by his family, and he says, and I believe, that if this bill becomes a law it will go directly to the scrap pile. I will quote liberally from Mr. Metcalf's testimony:

> Our product is the finer grades of steel, known as tool steel. It is a product into which the element of labor enters very largely and one that requires the utmost of skill, and it is a product that can not be made rapidly. The mere melting of the raw material in itself must be done slowly and carefully. The heating of the ingots after they are made is exceedingly important, and must be done slowly, or they will be destroyed. * * *
> Referring to the matter of mill labor, the average wage per day of all of the men in our employ during the year 1911 was $3.33⅓. That includes skilled and unskilled labor. The average wage per day of our skilled men, or what we call tonnage men—the rollers, hammer men, and others who work by the ton and employ their own labor—was $4.01 per day. These figures were taken from our pay-roll books, and are absolutely accurate as far as it is possible to make them. * * *
> During the year 1911 we had an average of 111 men employed. Of the 111, 56 were skilled men. There were 19 of what we might call intermediate men—that is, not common labor, but of the class of firemen, gas makers, and so on. * * *
> During the year 1911 the cost of labor in our mill was 50.7 per cent of the entire cost of production. The material charge was 31.1 per cent. This makes a total of 88.2 per cent, leaving only 11.2 per cent for all other expenses—the distribution of goods, the warehousing of goods, the salaries of the executive and administrative officers, and superintendence. * * *
> As to our material and supplies, the basis of all high-class tool steel is pure iron, and the maker of the best steel is the man who gets the purest iron into his steel. For that purpose we use two kinds of iron—the American-made iron and the Swedish iron. We are obliged to use the Swedish iron on account of the greater purity of that iron over the American iron. * * *
> It is better than our iron in this respect: It is lower in phosphorus and sulphur and it is freer from other impurities that are generally disregarded in the analysis of iron. * * *
> In addition to the iron we use metals for making our alloy steels, such as tungsten, vanadium, chromium, molybdenum, titanium, aluminum, etc. Of those elements there are two of which we use very little and one that we have practically discarded. * * *
> The plumbago for the manufacture of these crucibles comes from abroad. * * *
> The raw material is of such a nature that when it arrives at our plant the unloading of it is done by hand. If we are going to make good steel, the raw material must all be inspected—and it is all inspected—and that is done by hand by our own men. In addition to that, it must be analyzed in our laboratory. There is labor again. After it is put away in the bins in which it is kept the weighing up of the material for the crucible furnace is all hand labor. That material is hauled—and I am speaking only about our plant—by a little power dinky into the mill building, and the entire charge is lifted from the dinky up to the melting floor. Then the material must be packed in the crucibles by hand; otherwise we could not get it in. It must be properly distributed to get the best melting results. * * *

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. Do I understand that the material must be delivered by hand? I observe that in reciting the different processes it is always necessary to do it by hand. Is that true abroad as well as here?

Mr. OLIVER. What Mr. Metcalf means by delivering by hand is unloading and placing and distributing; that whereas material in the works involving larger tonnage is very largely handled by machinery—cranes and the like of that—the material for this tool steel must be handled by hand because each piece has to be inspected before it is used.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does the witness, from whom the Senator has been quoting, indicate what proportion of the annual product made in the United States is made in this factory?

Mr. OLIVER. No; but it is in reality not a very large proportion because it is a small mill. In fact, most of the mills in which this steel is turned out are small mills.

Mr. CUMMINS. We can not hear the Senator from Pennsylvania at this point in the Chamber.

Mr. OLIVER. I say I do not know what proportion of what is made in this country is turned out in this plant, but probably rather a small proportion, because it is only a small unit.

Mr. SHIVELY. I observe the Senator quoted this witness as saying that a very necessary article in the manufacture of this kind of steel is the product of that Swedish iron.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. In what form does that come?

Mr. OLIVER. In the shape of bar iron.

Mr. SHIVELY. In the shape of bar iron from Sweden?

Mr. OLIVER. And it possesses peculiar qualities which render it especially fit for this use.

Mr. SHIVELY. And a quality that does not appear in the American product?

Mr. OLIVER. There are American-made irons that are also suitable for this purpose, but when manufacturers want to get a peculiarly good product they use the Swedish bars.

Mr. SHIVELY. Is that true generally in the manufacture——

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; in the making of this kind of steel.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OLIVER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania remember the domestic production of tool steel so that it can be compared with the importations of tool steel?

Mr. OLIVER. The domestic production of tool steel is from 75,000 to 100,000 tons.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator is in error about that. I think he said we imported several million pounds.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; from 2,000,000 to 3,500,000 pounds.

Mr. CUMMINS. And we manufacture something like 100,000 tons.

Mr. OLIVER. Not of this very high-grade steel.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are, of course, many grades of tool steel; but it is true, is it not, that we manufacture in this country so large a proportion of it that the imports are really negligible?

Mr. OLIVER. No. I think the Senator is entirely in error in that. Of this fine steel, I think the proportion we manufacture is not a very great deal more than—not, say, more than two or three times as much. In all probability not as much as that, because it goes a long way, and if produced in large quantities the country could not use it.

There is another thing, Mr. President, about this grade of steel. It must be remembered that of this fine steel, each ton of it or each pound of it—because it is quoted in pounds and sold in pounds and used in pounds and not in tons—each pound of it displaces 5 to 10 pounds of the product that was made in America before its introduction.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand there are many grades of what is known as tool steel.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the value, as of silk or any other commodity, runs over a range.

Mr. OLIVER. Tool steel would run over a range of from probably 4 cents a pound to at least 50 cents.

Mr. CUMMINS. Taking the grades all together, it is true, is it not, that we make in this country nineteen-twentieths of all the tool steel we use?

Mr. OLIVER. I would not think so much as that, but we make a great deal of it. In fact, judging from the actual work of the Senator from Iowa, as shown in his amendment, to which I am coming later, I do not think there is much difference of opinion between him and me on this particular paragraph.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. What is the annual proportion of the steel to which the Senator is now referring to the cost of the product?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Metcalf says, taking his entire works, the cost of labor is 50½ per cent of the cost of the product. Taking the average of the works, the entire range, the pay rolls amount to 50½ per cent. The finer grades would amount to 60 per cent or more, because the finer steel requires much more careful handling and more labor than the coarser grades.

Mr. SHIVELY. Evidently I did not make myself clear to the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator has doubtless correctly represented this grade of steel as being peculiarly necessary in the general iron and steel industry, especially in making iron and steel tools. What I should like to know is what proportion the entire amount of this steel in this country bears to the annual output of the tools into which it is worked?

Mr. OLIVER. I can not tell the Senator that; I do not know. Anything I would say would be mere guesswork.

Mr. SHIVELY. If it is absolutely necessary to accomplish the highest results in some departments of iron and steel manufacture, then we raise the question how far we will go in sacrificing the general iron and steel industry to what the Senator himself admits is a rather slender proportion of the iron and steel industry.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not asking that any portion of the iron and steel industry shall be sacrificed. When the supply was entirely in the hands of the importers and foreign manufacturers this steel brought 75 cents a pound, and immediately upon the introduction of American competition it was reduced to 40 and 45 cents a pound. That is the inevitable effect of the protective tariff, and that is what I am arguing for.

Mr. SHIVELY. Was it possible that you needed a protective tariff against the product if the price was so high abroad? The Senator is stating a condition of affairs indicating that the price of this particular kind of steel was extortionately high abroad. If it was, did you need any protection against that price?

Mr. OLIVER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I said nothing of the kind. I said the price of this steel produced abroad was 75 cents a pound at home, and as long as they had a monopoly and were not faced by our competition they extorted that price from the American people.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator says at home——

Mr. OLIVER. I say at home, in the United States of America, where I live and where you live.

Mr. SHIVELY. It cost the manufacturer 75 cents a pound.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. It was so high?

Mr. OLIVER. It was.

Mr. SHIVELY. And afterwards it cost only 40 cents a pound?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; after it was faced with the competition of our own people.

Mr. SHIVELY. Did you require a protective tariff to induce the American people to invest against such an extortionate price abroad?

Mr. OLIVER. But the minute we began to produce it and offer it in our markets, the importers reduced the price until they got it to a point where our manufacturers could not compete without additional protection, which was granted them under the Payne bill, by an amendment introduced in the Senate.

I am very willing to be interrogated by the Senator on any such subject. But to resume Mr. Metcalf's testimony——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. OLIVER. I do.

Mr. GORE. I should like the Senator to state the value of the total output of this particular mill annually.

Mr. OLIVER. I can not. I have no testimony here to show it. To resume Mr. Metcalf's testimony, he said:

> After these pots are charged with 100 pounds of steel they are lifted from the floor and dropped into the furnace by hand. When I say "dropped" I do not mean that they are let go, either. The man has to straddle the furnace and let them down very gently to avoid breaking the crucible. During the melting process we have one gas maker for each of our two furnaces—a 24-pot furnace and a 36-pot furnace. We have one gas maker for each of those furnaces. * * *
> After the material is melted the pots are pulled out of the furnace by hand. That is not common, cheap, ordinary labor. It takes a very powerful and a very skillful man to do it. He has got to straddle the furnace, which is practically 3 feet wide, and reach with tongs almost down to the floor level, and get hold of the pot and pull it up; and he has got to get his tongs away up as high as his head to clear the floor, and then the crucible is swung aside. That is entirely hand labor. The skimming of any impurities off the top of the steel and the pouring are also hand labor. * * *
> After the ingots are taken from the furnace, after they are poured, they are shaken down by hand. In other words, the molds are taken apart and the ingots are taken out by hand. They are assorted, and they are then inspected. They are taken to an inspecting floor, and there they are very carefully inspected for imperfections in the casting of them, and inspected to determine the temper of the steel, as we call it. By "temper" I mean the hardness or the softness of it. * * *
> After these ingots are inspected they are assorted and marked and piled. That is largely hand labor, with the assistance of the crane. * * *
> When the orders are issued to the millmen for the material to be rolled, the ingots are taken to the furnace by crane, but the heating and charging and rolling over and the pulling out of the ingots from the furnace is all done by hand. We can not dump our crucible ingots into a furnace helter-skelter and trust to their heating evenly. They must be very carefully laid in the bottom of the furnace, in even rows, in order that we may get the same temperature all through the furnace. * * *
> After that is done it is not a question merely of shutting the furnace door and waiting until the furnace gets red hot. Our heater has to be continually opening the door, and if there is one ingot that is not getting its proper amount of heat, that is not heating fast enough or is heating too fast, we have to turn it over and put it in some other part of the furnace. * * *
> We must have a man who knows accurately the temperature of the steel from the color in the furnace. Then, when it is up to the proper temperature, the heater and the roller between them decide when they are ready to roll, and they go ahead with the rolling operation. The ingots are taken out of the furnace by hand labor, and the man who takes them out swings them onto a little trolley, that he pushes by hand—it is not a power trolley—and pushes them to the mill. * * *
> In such a mill as ours they change the rolls and the size and shape of the product very frequently, so that in addition to heating his ingots properly the roller must heat test pieces in the furnace, and run them through and try them out and carefully gauge them, to be sure that his mill is properly lined and that his guides are properly set, and that after the rolling is done he is going to get just what his order calls for. * * *
> Until the Payne bill was passed a very large proportion of the high-speed steel was made abroad. In our own business we attempted to make high-speed steel about 1902 or 1903, I think. The results were not satisfactory and it was abandoned. We took it up two years ago, and we have been making high-speed steel very successfully since. * * *

This, Mr. President, will give some idea of the manner in which this steel is made, and of the great amount of care and labor involved in its manufacture. Now, the Underwood bill proposes to allow all this steel to come in at a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem. The average invoice price of high-speed steel imported during the year 1911 was about 33 cents per pound—that is, the foreign price—and the rate of duty averaged about 19 per cent. Under the provisions of the Underwood bill this steel would pay a duty of about 3.3 cents per pound. Now, in the manufacture of this steel there is used 18 per cent of tungsten, 3½ per cent of chromium, and 1 per cent of vanadium. All, or practically all, of these metals are imported. The Underwood bill levies a duty of 15 per cent on all of them. Therefore, on 100 pounds of this steel the American manufacturers will be compelled to pay duty on 18 pounds of tungsten, 3½ pounds of chromium, and 1 pound of vanadium. The market price of tungsten—I allude to the foreign price—is 55 cents per pound, of chromium 6 cents per pound, and of vanadium $3 per pound. Computing the duty on this basis, the duty on the tungsten used in the manufacture of 100 pounds of this steel would be $1.48½, of the chromium slightly over 3 cents, and of the vanadium 45 cents, making a total of approximately $2, or 2 cents for every pound of steel, without making any allowance whatever for waste in manufacture. In addition to this, the duty on the Swedish iron used in the manufacture of the higher grades, which takes up the remaining 77½ per cent of the mixture, would be at least one-fourth of a cent. making the total duty actually paid on the ingredients entering into the composition of a pound of high-speed steel a trifle more than 2¼ cents.

The duty on the steel itself under the Underwood bill would be from 3 cents to 3¼ cents per pound, leaving from three-quarters of a cent to a cent per pound as the only protection for the American manufacturer and the American laborer. None of the above ingredients is dutiable in England, from which country comes the chief competition in this steel. As I have before stated, notwithstanding the advance in duties provided for by the Payne bill, the imports of this kind of steel have increased in quantity—the amount imported last year being 2,870,267 pounds, as against 2,083,672 pounds in 1909. Even on the basis of a revenue tariff there is no excuse for a reduction of the duty upon this steel, while from the standpoint of even the most moderate protection it is altogether indefensible.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OLIVER. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At that point, where the Senator states the importations, will he state the American consumption?

Mr. OLIVER. I have no statistics relating to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can you state the American production?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know that, either.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is rather important, to be able to gauge the relative importance of the imports, to know that.

Mr. OLIVER. I have carefully read the testimony before the Finance Committee, and that question does not appear to have been asked. I could find out something in the course of a week or two by an inquiry as to the approximate production. I say that from what I know of the demand for this very high grade of steel, the 2,800,000 pounds, or 1,400 tons, must be a very considerable part of the amount used in this country. It is not a negligible factor by any means. It is very considerable, and that is shown by the fact that the imports in 1907 and 1908, which ran from about 2,000,000 to 3,500,000 pounds, were heavy enough to drive a lot of our manufacturers out of business.

The Senator understands what I mean. The 3,500,000 pounds of importations in 1907 and those of the preceding years were so great as to discourage our manufacturers from proceeding with it. The 2,800,000 pounds now imported must be a very considerable part of the total amount consumed, notwithstanding the natural growth of use which would come with years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems important to have the statistics both as to the production and consumption in this country on most of these items, and I have wondered why those have not been furnished.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will examine those statistics he will find that they are all in gross. He can find probably the production of open-hearth steel, he can find the production of crucible steel in some of the statistical reports, but where the matter of tool steel itself involves so many different sizes and kinds and uses, as a rule the production of any one of these particular kinds or sizes is not given.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is not able to state what it is?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not the information. So that ends it as far as I am concerned.

The burden of the attacks made upon Schedule C of the Payne bill by the Senator from Iowa is based upon the assumption that, notwithstanding the reduction of duties, the tariff was still prohibitory and did not interfere with a monopoly of the business on the part of the American manufacturers. That this was not the case, so far, at least, as this one commodity is concerned, was apparent to the acute mind of the Senator, for in his amendment he interferes with these duties only just enough to show that he has been on the job.

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not hear the last statement.

Mr. OLIVER. I say, Mr. President, that so far at least as this one commodity is concerned, it was apparent to the acute mind of the Senator from Iowa that the duties provided for in this paragraph are reasonable, for in his amendment he interferes with these particular duties just enough to show that he has been on the job. Did the Senator hear that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I heard that, Mr. President, and I desire to reply to it just now. So far as the reduction of duties upon the heavier forms of duties is concerned, my amendment reduces them more than the Democratic bill.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator is talking about one part of a horse's anatomy and I am talking about another. I am talking about this finer steel just now. In justice to the Senator from Iowa I will say that I believe he honestly thinks he is a protectionist. The difference between us is that I am always afraid that we will give too little protection, while he is afraid we will give too much, and in his zeal he is likely to take it away altogether.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I admit that when the Senator from Pennsylvania thinks of this subject he always thinks of the man who is producing the commodity and the profit he is to receive. When I think of the subject I am thinking of the man who uses the commodity and must pay for it.

Mr. OLIVER. Following that argument out to its ultimate conclusion would make the Senator a free trader, and I know he is not a free trader.

The best way to judge of a tree is by its fruit, and we can best judge of the character of this bill by inquiring into its results as shown in the volume of imports since its enactment. Taking this paragraph 131 as an instance, we find that, lumping all the articles enumerated therein, the imports, which in 1909 amounted to only 28,285,124 pounds, in 1910 were 83,388,781 pounds, and in 1911, 85,716,478 pounds. In other words, in each of the years immediately following its enactment the imports were three times as much as in the year immediately preceding it. This increase in imports is not confined to the higher grades of steel which I have just been discussing, but extends to the lower grades as well. For instance, on the second item in the paragraph, articles valued at from three-fourths of a cent to 1.3 cents per pound, the imports, which in 1909 amounted to only 5,070,253 pounds, in 1911 were 48,947,148 pounds. And applying this test to other paragraphs of the schedule we find many instances of the same kind of result. Take structural steel, which is the favorite subject of attack on the part of the Senator from Iowa. The imports of structural steel for the last four years are as follows:

	Pounds.
1909	11,905,034
1910	23,879,101
1911	24,907,259

And yet, if we take the fanciful figures presented by the Senator from Iowa as a basis, structural steel is manufactured in this country cheaper than in any other place in the world.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OLIVER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the fact that while we imported in 1911 structural iron and steel of the value of $325,018, we exported structural iron and steel in 1910—I have not the information for 1911—of the value of $5,800,551; in other words, we exported about 15 times as much as we imported. That seems to me to be a fair premise for the conclusion that we make it about as cheap as any other country in the world.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, that may be so. I will allow the Senator all the comfort he can get out of that argument; but it does not at all disturb what I say, that the imports of this kind of structural steel increased very materially.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. The imports of this kind of steel increased after the imposition of these duties. That is one of the fruits of the Payne bill, and it shows that those duties were not prohibitory. Now I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the importations in 1908 were about 3,000,000 pounds, I believe, and in 1909, 11,000,000 pounds, as I remember the figures, an increase of threefold in one year, both years being higher than under the Payne-Aldrich Act.

Mr. OLIVER. Then they more than doubled the two following years.

Mr. GORE. There was an increase of 100 per cent instead of 200 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I, at this point, make a suggestion? I know the Senator from Pennsylvania will recognize that while we did import in 1911, solely on account of certain freight rates that could not be overcome, 24,907,259 pounds, we produced in this country during the year 1910, 2,124,000. If I can compare those two hastily, I would say that our imports were about one-tenth of 1 per cent, or less than that, of our production.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I will reply to the Senator from Iowa first, and then I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

I can not sympathize with the theories of Senators who argue that because our imports are a small proportion of what we produce, therefore legislation should be enacted that will enable us to increase them. That is what it means. I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, just for the purpose of emphasizing the statement that has been made, I think it would be well to reduce the imports and production to dollars and cents.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator can do that when his time comes. I do not choose to put it in dollars and cents. I am putting it in pounds.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator any objection to my reading the imports in dollars and cents and the production in this country in dollars and cents?

Mr. OLIVER. At this time I do object, Mr. President, for I can not see that it affects the question and I want to proceed with my argument.

The schedules of the tariff bills, so far as phraseology is concerned, have followed the same line of construction since the act of 1883. They are the outgrowth of 50 years of experience. They are something that it is exceedingly dangerous to trifle with, and whatever may be the theory upon which bills are framed, whether on a protective or a revenue basis, changes in the construction of these schedules should not be idly entered upon and should only be made after a careful and intelligent investigation. Experience has shown that times without number advantage has been taken of ambiguous expressions used in the construction of these bills and has led oftentimes to frauds upon the revenue and to changes in duties, which were only corrected when the time came for the enactment of a new tariff. These paragraphs, as they now read, have for nearly 30 years been the subject of expert investigation and have been repeatedly construed from time to time by both the Treasury Department and the courts, so that their intent and meaning are now well understood; and their language and their classification should not be changed unless the necessity for such change be clearly shown and its effect be clearly understood. Both the Underwood bill and the Cummins amendment err greatly in this respect. They have shifted different articles from the places where they naturally belong, and in so doing have produced results which perhaps even the framers themselves did not intend and which would probably lead to results that would surprise their authors. A glaring instance of this is found in the recasting of this paragraph 131, about which I have talked so much, in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. This paragraph covers an enormous variety of subjects, running from the ingots to the highest-priced steel. The duties levied therein are graded according to the value of the product. The Underwood bill practically retains the language of the existing law, its intent evidently being to reduce the duties by half, but making them ad valorem instead of specific.

In the Payne law, which is substantially the same as in other laws preceding it, so far as language is concerned, it begins as follows:

> Steel ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, and slabs, by whatever process made; die blocks or blanks; billets and bars and tapered or beveled bars; mill shafting; pressed, sheared, or stamped shapes, not advanced in value or condition by any process of operation subsequent to the process of stamping; hammer molds or swaged steel; gun-barrel molds not in bars; alloys used as substitutes for steel in the manufacture of tools—and proceeds to levy duty on all of them graded according to value, the values beginning at less than three-fourths of a cent per pound and running up to steel valued above 40 cents per pound, which carries a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem.

In the Underwood bill the same general language is used, except that the duty levied is a uniform one of 10 per cent ad valorem, except upon crucible plate steel and saw plates, upon which the duty is 15 per cent ad valorem. The classification in both of these laws remains substantially the same. The Senator from Iowa, however, in the light of his superior knowledge, has located these articles in three separate paragraphs:

> First (par. 4). Steel ingots not advanced beyond casting, in all forms, $1.60 per ton.
> Second (par. 5). Billets, blooms, slabs, and other forms of iron and steel not herein specifically described and less advanced in manufacture than iron and steel in bars, $2 per ton: Provided, That if charcoal is used as fuel in their manufacture they shall pay an additional duty of $1 per ton.
> Third (par. 28). Tapered or beveled bars, etc.

From this point the wording and classification remain substantially the same as in the Payne bill with some change in duties.

Now, the Senator from Iowa in making this change was doubtless impressed with the idea that a steel ingot, being but little advanced in value beyond pig iron, should pay only a nominal rate of duty. In fact, he stated in his speech upon this subject that the ingot, so far as sales and shipment are concerned, was a negligible quantity, and in this he was correct as far as the term applies to the ingot turned out by the Bessemer and open-hearth processes and used in the manufacture of rails, billets, structural iron, and so forth. But the Senator forgot, or possibly he did not know, that all steel is the product of an ingot, and, in fact, the term was first applied in steel manufacture to the ingot or casting used in the production of crucible tool steel. These ingots weigh only from 90 to 100 pounds, and if this bill were enacted into law and the language retained as proposed by the Senator from Iowa, it would not be a month before the mills in Sheffield would be shipping to this country crucible steel ingots, varying in value from $50 to $500 a ton, all of which would pay a duty of only $1.60 per ton. These ingots could readily be rolled into bar steel in this country, and the cast-steel manufacturers of America would be out of business. The same objection applies to paragraph 5 of the Cummins amendment, which places billets, blooms, slabs, and other forms of steel less advanced in manufacture than steel in bars in a separate class at $2 per ton, with the addition of another dollar if charcoal is used as fuel in their manufacture. Under this paragraph crucible steel billets and slabs of high grade could be imported at a rate of $2 per gross ton and at a nominal cost could be hammered into tool steel worth from 30 to 50 cents per pound.

A manufacturer of tool steel has written to me as follows, referring to this paragraph:

> The effect of such a bill would be to compel this company to abandon the manufacture of all high-grade ingots, blooms, or billets, and to buy them abroad, or for us to establish works in England or other foreign countries to produce the ingots, which we would then ship into this country with only a nominal duty, and convert them into finished bars in our own mills, and while it would compel us to manufacture our ingots abroad or go out of the business, it would enable the foreigner to ship his ingots into this country at the nominal duty, finish them here, and thus create a ruinous competition. The effect is so horrible to contemplate that we feel sure that it is all a mistake, and only needs attention called to it to have it promptly and thoroughly corrected.

I know that the Senator from Iowa intended no such thing as this when he framed his amendment, and whatever I may think of other parts of his substitute, I give him full credit for a desire, in this paragraph, to afford reasonable protection to American manufacturers; but the fact is, Mr. President, that no man alone and unaided, no matter how gifted he be or how deep and extensive his knowledge of the subject, can prepare a bill for the revision of this important schedule that will stand the test of honest criticism. And I mention this most glaring instance to show how unwise it would be for us to incur the risks involved in hastily passing upon a measure so fraught with menace to our people.

I have before intimated that both the House bill and the Cummins amendment seem to have been framed upon the theory that the iron and steel business of the United States was centered in the United States Steel Corporation and a few other large companies, and the speeches of the Senator from North Carolina in advocacy of the one, and of the Senator from Iowa in advocating the other, were certainly aimed at these great industries. But, while aimed at them, my belief is that they will miss their mark. While the steel corporation may be greatly injured by this legislation, in my opinion it will still be able to withstand it, but it will do so very largely at the expense of the men it employs, who will be compelled to suffer for the wrongs done them by the American Congress.

The framers of these bills forget that the steel and iron of this country in the shapes in which they finally reach the consumer are largely the handiwork of a multitude of small manufacturers. It is in the shaping of these innumerable articles and forms that the foreign manufacturer, with his cheap labor and his less restrictive laws relating to labor, will underbid our manufacturers and unload his wares upon us.

To show the extent and the variety of these manufactures I will enumerate some of them. Take bar iron, for instance (not bar steel). There are 6 mills which manufacture bar iron in New England, 11 in the State of New York, 7 in New Jersey; there are 53 such mills in Pennsylvania, of which 44 are east of the Allegheny Mountains and depend altogether for a market upon the Atlantic seaboard, where their products will be open to European competition; there are 3 such mills in Delaware, 1 in Maryland, 4 in Virginia, 4 in West Virginia, 3 in Kentucky, 1 in Tennessee, 5 in Alabama, 1 in Texas, 13 in Ohio, 7 in Indiana, 8 in Illinois, 1 in Michigan, 1 in Wisconsin, 3 in Missouri, 1 in Kansas, 1 in Oklahoma, 2 in Colorado, 1 in Washington, 1 in Oregon, and 3 in California. These mills are in no syndicate or trust. Each of them, as a unit, is small, but as a whole they employ 20,000 men, whose living is menaced by this legislation. There is in the city of Pittsburgh a large plant which manufactures nothing but railroad spikes. It is owned entirely by the children and grandchildren of the man who founded it nearly 50 years ago. Their only customers are, of course, the railroads. Yet railroad spikes, for some reason which no man can fathom, are taken from the dutiable list and placed on the free list. There is another plant, in the same city, established by my own brothers in 1863, and still officered by their sons, whose chief products are bolts, nuts, and washers. Under this most marvelous bill the bolts carry a duty of 15 per cent, while the nuts and washers, which go with them, are on the free list. Can any plausible reason be given for this? Is it possible that some large user of nuts and washers had a latchkey to the door of the room in which this bill was prepared? It looks very much like it.

The Underwood bill places all fence and baling wire and wire nails on the free list. Outside of and absolutely independent of the United States Steel Corporation there are in the United States 83 plants producing fence wire. Two of them are in the State of Alabama, 14 in Illinois, 14 in Indiana, 10 in Michigan, 18 in Ohio, 4 in Pennsylvania, 4 in Nebraska, 4 in Wisconsin, 2 in Missouri, 2 in Massachusetts, 2 in Kansas, and 1 in each of the States of Colorado, Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Minnesota, and Texas. They are scattered over the length and breadth of the land and vary in size from a small plant employing not more than 30 or 40 men to that of the Pittsburgh Steel Co., of Pittsburgh, with its seventeen and one-half millions of capital and many thousands of workmen. Not one of these concerns controls the supply of its own ore or of its coal. The raw material of many of them consists of steel billets, and of most of them is as far advanced as wire rods. The abolition of the duty on these products will not enable the farmers throughout the great Central West to purchase their fence wire one cent below what they now pay for it, but, in my opinion, in the end will compel them to pay even more, and for this reason: It will—I think it must—deprive the American factories of the markets which they now control on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts. In doing this it will necessarily force the American manufacturers to reduce their output. The inevitable result of reduced output is increased cost, and with increased cost must necessarily come increased prices in the interior markets, which they will still control. The fact is that the competition of these 83 factories has brought the price of wire products in this country so low that they are now sold by the manufacturers at a profit which is very narrow indeed. Any excess price which the consumer pays for them is due to the exactions, whether justifiable or not, of the middlemen through whose hands they pass. I will give you an example of this.

Sometime ago I purchased a few pounds of wire nails at a hardware store in this city. I paid for them 4 cents a pound. The establishment from which I bought them buys these nails by the carload, and I ascertained that on that same day the open manufacturers' price of these nails was less than 2 cents per pound. It may be that the merchant from whom I bought them was justified in charging the price he did, but it does seem that if the much-reviled manufacturer can furnish the material, the factory, and the labor used in making these nails, and pay for transporting them over 300 miles for less than 2 cents, the merchant ought to be able to sell them to the consumer at considerably less than double that sum.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OLIVER. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that the manufacturers of the United States are making more wire nails than are consumed in this country, and that they enjoy an export trade in wire nails, competing in other countries?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I have no doubt that that is the case with regard to one manufacturer in the iron and steel business. The export business is, I may say, absolutely in the hands of the United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiary companies. The reason why they have been enabled to increase their lines of export business to such an extent as they have is because they have systematically gone to work and sent their representatives into every country upon the face of the earth which uses or is likely to use any of the products of their manufacture. They have found out the exact shape in which these different countries want their goods put up and how they generally pay for them, and they have helped to finance them. As a result of that they have built up a very large export trade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, will the Senator right at that point——

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will allow me, I will complete what I have to say, and then I shall be very glad to once more yield to him.

The export business, not only in the steel industry but in all other lines of industry, depends not only upon the price at which the goods are sold to the consumer beyond the sea, but it depends also upon how much the man who is producing them knows about the consumer and the consuming countries. The United States Steel Corporation, with a largeness of vision which characterizes pretty much all of their acts, have set themselves about to find these things out. As a result of that they are having a growing export trade.

I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In addition to the fact that the United States steel manufacturers are making and exporting wire nails in competition with the world, is it not also a fact that they practically have a complete monopoly of the wire-nail market in this country, and that practically no wire nails, or such a very small quantity as to be negligible, were imported during recent years?

Mr. OLIVER. Imported?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, I confess, Mr. President, that the present duty on wire nails is just about sufficient to maintain the American market for the American producer. I think that is what the framers of the tariff bill intended. I know, as one of the Senators who voted for it, that that is what I intended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Pennsylvania must admit that if the present duty is prohibitory and has kept out competition it is too high.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not admit anything of the kind, Mr. President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And it seems to me the Senator must also admit that if American manufacturers are exporting wire nails and selling them in competition with foreign manufacturers in other markets they could sell them in this market if they were free.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not admit anything of the kind, Mr. President. The question of selling goods for export at lower prices than obtain in this country is one that I did not intend to touch on to-day; in fact, I will not touch on it, but I very much doubt that the wire nails which the steel corporation sells abroad are sold at lower prices than the average of prices which they obtain in this country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, does it not also follow, if that is the case, that no tariff is needed?

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If they are able to sell wire nails abroad at American prices, they could sell them in this country in competition with the foreign manufacturer.

Mr. OLIVER. It may be, and I have no doubt in most cases it is, the fact that they are not selling them abroad in competition with prices abroad. I have no doubt that they are putting large quantities of them into countries where the manufacturers of other countries have not the entrée. Another thing, knowing nothing about it whatever, but which I will venture, I would not be at all surprised if they are doing what the manufacturers of other countries do, but what the law forbids them to do in this country, and that is making agreements with foreign producers with regard to the division of the trade.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OLIVER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania stated, or I understood him to state, that substantially all the export business of commodities covered by the metal schedule was done by the United States Steel Corporation. I do not think he intended to say so. I think it is true that the exports of the United States Steel Corporation are really very much less in amount, less than one-half, I think not one-fourth, of the exports under the metal schedule; but what is true is that of the articles manufactured by such concerns as the United States Steel Corporation that company is the chief exporter.

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, yes; that is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. But taking the whole schedule together, we export very largely in excess of the amount exported by the United States Steel Corporation, and export very largely in excess of our imports under the schedule.

Mr. OLIVER. I intended in what I said to refer only to the articles made by the United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries and similar articles.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have heard the retail merchant assailed in this Chamber, from the Republican side especially, and charged with all the burden of high prices, and nobody seems disposed to lift a voice in his behalf. So I am going to put in the RECORD now an explanation of why the Senator from Pennsylvania had to pay that merchant twice as much as the merchant paid for those 4 pounds of nails. The merchant paid 2 cents a pound, or 8 cents for 4 pounds, while the Senator from Pennsylvania paid 16 cents for the 4 pounds, because he made the merchant hitch up a wagon, take a boy, and send them to his house.

Mr. OLIVER. I did not do that, Mr. President.

Mr. BAILEY. Did the Senator himself take them home?

Mr. OLIVER. I took them right at the door. The fact of the matter is that I wanted them for the purpose of furnishing this example. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, the merchant's customers so seldom do that that the merchant has to fix his prices upon the supposition that he must deliver the goods. The statistics of this country show that the retail merchants are not enjoying very princely incomes, nor are they the beneficiaries of very great fortunes. If they do charge high prices, they have been made necessary by the modern methods of purchase and delivery.

When I was a boy, if my folk wanted a ham, they sent me down to the town, and I bought it and carried it home, but nobody does that now. The merchant must provide a horse, a wagon, and a man, and deliver the goods, and for those things the consumers must pay. So long as the people make the merchants wait on them, not only at the store, but by delivering the goods, they must expect to pay and ought to pay the price. I am of the opinion that the retail merchants of this country are entitled fairly to an exemption from the general charge that they are the cause of high prices.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator says. In giving this example, I was not intending to reflect upon the merchant, but merely wished to demonstrate the fact that the price which the consumer pays for nails is more than double what the manufacturer receives; and yet, Mr. President, the average consumer would charge the high price, if he thought it was a high price, not to the merchant, not to the fact that a delivery wagon is required, and not to any intermediate agency, but to the manufacturer. The Senator from Georgia, I believe, rose.

Mr. BACON. I said nothing.

Mr. OLIVER. I thought the Senator desired to interrupt me.

Mr. BACON. No; but as the Senator has given me the opportunity, I will make a suggestion further on that line, and that is, that the retail merchant has to deal with a vast multitude of customers, and in all retail business, dealing in that way, there is a certain proportion of loss, occasioned by those who do not pay, and that loss has to be distributed in a general business so as to get from those who do pay that which will compensate for the loss occasioned by those who do not pay. A great many other considerations of that kind might be mentioned which add to the necessary increase in prices charged by the retailer when he disposes of his goods.

Mr. OLIVER. I realize that, Mr. President. I also realize, what the Senator doubtless knows, that the manufacturer never loses anything by bad debts. Every merchant who buys nails from him pays up promptly, of course. If the Senator had had the experience in his life that I have had, he would have found that losses in business are not confined to the mercantile class by any means.

I could cite many other industries, consisting of units small in themselves but important as they affect the general welfare of the country, all of which are brought face to face with ruin by this threatened legislation; but I will not take up the time of the Senate to enumerate them. I think I have said sufficient to show that the men to whom it means most are not the big men who control the policy of the United States Steel Corporation, but the more modest manufacturers among the rank and file of our people, and the multitudes whom they employ. The first of them to be affected will be the men who work with their hands, not only because their wages will be reduced, though that is inevitable, but also because great numbers of them will be deprived of employment.

In estimating the influence which even a partial opening of our markets to foreign competition would have upon the workingman, I was lately led to inquire as to the number of men who will be deprived of employment by the importation of even one lot of 1,000 tons of steel rails into this country; and from the best information that I could obtain I find that if one of our railroads would import 1,000 tons of rails it would deprive 5,200 American workingmen of employment for one day. In other words, the labor involved in the mining of the ore and the coal, the work at the furnace and the steel works on 1,000 tons of rails is equivalent to the labor of 5,200 men for a single day, and this includes only the labor of the men actually employed in and about the production of the rails themselves and does not include collateral labor, such as outside transportation, and so forth. Every pound of every substance that we can make which is imported from outside of our borders drives out of employment some certain number of American workingmen. You talk about protection being for the benefit of the manufacturer. I grant it, but the first and prime beneficiary is the man who works with his hands and who depends upon his labor for his living.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is some consideration being given to the propriety of having the bill read at this time, and it has been suggested that I defer any further remarks until the bill is read; but if the Senators present will give me a few moments of their attention I will proceed just a little further with the consideration of this question, and then, if it is desired, the reading of the bill can be begun.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Idaho will pardon me for a moment, the suggestion about the reading of the bill was made upon the theory that the Senator did not wish to speak for more than a very short time this afternoon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only desire to speak a short time.

Mr. SIMMONS. But if the Senator is able to speak, I would very much prefer that he would go on now, and the bill can be read at some other time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only desire to speak a short time this afternoon. It is my intention to consider the bill by sections, according to the various questions involved.

Yesterday I dwelt at some length upon the two primary questions—that is, the relation that the money of the poeple bears to the business of the people and the necessity of providing occupation for the money. It is as necessary to the prosperity of our people that an occupation for their money should be furnished as that they be furnished with any other element that contributes to their prosperity.

I drew attention to the comparative volume of money belonging to the different classes of the citizenship—and I use the word "classes" in no invidious sense—but from the official records I called attention to the fact that the working people, those who work for wages, in financial strength are the equal of the people engaged in business who employ labor. It is not a surprising condition, but it is one that has been lost sight of. The amount of money held in the savings banks represents the wealth of the laborer. No part of it belongs to the Steel Trust or the Standard Oil Co. or any of that class of people. It is the surplus of the working people.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in that connection—perhaps the Senator is going to make the statement I was about to call attention to——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to yielding to the Senator, even if he anticipates what I was going to say.

Mr. LODGE. Judging from my own State, the deposits in savings banks must represent the savings of people who are making small earnings. In my State the total amount of a deposit is limited to $1,000. According to the last statistics I have seen, the average deposit was $125, and the total was over $700,000,000. No capitalist invests a thousand dollars in one bank and then in another and lets it stay there at 4 per cent.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was in one State the deposits were over $700,000,000?

Mr. LODGE. In one State.

Mr. HEYBURN. The aggregate savings deposits now in the United States are about $4,000,000,000, and if the average deposit is the same as it is in Massachusetts it is not difficult to compute the number of prosperous working people in this country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. In just a moment—and the plea that is being made by our friends on the other side is that this legislation is sought in the interests of the destitute workingman. Now, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope that it is true that every penny deposited in the savings banks of the country represents the savings of a workingman. It is not, however, quite true in my part of the country. Our savings banks pay 4 per cent interest; there is no limitation upon deposits in our State, and therefore some of the money that is deposited there is deposited by others than the workingmen; but I do not want anybody to understand that I desire to paint a gloomy picture with respect to the condition of the workingmen. They are in this country, as I said yesterday, the best conditioned and the best situated of all the workingmen of the world, and I want to keep them so.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was the avowed purpose of the tariff legislation of 1896. The laboring people were not prosperous then.

Mr. GORE. I merely should like to remark at this place that, according to the statistics submitted, more than one-sixth of all the savings in the United States are in the protected State of Massachusetts, less than one-thirtieth of all the people in the United States reside in the protected State of Massachusetts, and more than 40 per cent of all the population of Massachusetts are foreign born, beneficiaries of protection against foreign labor, now transplanted to the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. The statement just made by the Senator from Oklahoma is an argument in favor of the protective system. If the Senator from Oklahoma will refer to the statistics a little further, he will find that the savings are those of people who have employment at such wages as leaves them a surplus. I will make another statement—that this surplus or profit of the working people of this country is greater than any profit made by the business men or organizations. They have a volume of money sufficient to buy out the Standard Oil Co., if it is a company, or the steel corporation; in fact, they have capital in bank that would buy out the business of every business concern in the United States. So they are masters of the situation, and if they do not take advantage of that fact it reflects credit upon their conservative wisdom.

We are not hearing from the working people here in regard to these matters. We are hearing from the agitators. We are hearing from the people who farm the working people, who depend upon the working people to contribute to their livelihood and luxuries.

Mr. President, this is a strong point in favor of the existing conditions of the working people of this country and of the protective tariff. In 1896 when the present tariff system was again reasserted by the people of this country the workingmen were not employed. It was the admitted cry of both parties that there were starvation and idleness and distress. The Democratic Party at that time had a theory that by starting the printing press to work making money and by changing the financial system of the Government they could start the wheels of industry and the employment of wage earners. The Republican Party asserted that if you returned to conditions under which prosperity did exist, prosperity would exist. The people sustained the view of the Republican Party, whether as an experiment or not is not material, but the prophecy and the promise of the party were realized to the people. Industry was revived, there was no more cry of hard times for years and years until the agitators had become idle, and they were always idle, and were out of an occupation and probably in some discredit with those with whom they had lived for years. And the agitators, finding themselves out of a job, started in to make the people believe they were poor and destitute and wretched, and the political exigencies of the hour—of the oft-repeated hour—seemed to prompt a part of the people to insist that there was a necessity for the revision of the tariff laws under which this prosperity existed. They had no other job in sight, and that was rather an enticing one, because it carried with it position, office, salary, dominion, and so they apparently convinced some of the advocates of the policy of prosperity to believe there was something in their cry, that the garment needed repairing.

I am addressing my remarks now to those in the Republican Party who participated in bringing about this condition of prosperity, and I ask them to take another look over the field and see whether or not there is any reason why a system of law that produced prosperity in 1896 should not do it in this year 1912. Like conditions, as a rule, produce like results. Return to those conditions of governmental policy and you will hear no longer, except from the agitator, a cry of necessity for a change in the law.

I address these remarks to Republicans who have been persuaded or half persuaded of the necessity for revising the tariff. I do not address them to Democrats, because they represent a different school, and I have enough to do without burdening myself with undertaking to convert the Democrats. If we can keep the Republicans within the lines of Republican policy and system of Government, the Democrats afford a very nice audience, and can look on at the prosperity of the Republicans. Our difficulty is in keeping down not the discontent so much as the inclination on the part of Republicans who have stood for the same policies that we advocate to-day to accept the idea that there is discontent. They hear a great big noise, and they seem to be terrified by it, but it is the noise of the Democracy, and a Republican wants to keep his political nerves in such good order that he will not be terrified by the noise of the Democracy. So that I address my remarks—and I will not look when I say it—to the Republicans inclined to be scared by this false noise.

Mr. President, the people who are interested in this are not any more the producers than the consumers. They are about equally divided in this country I find upon looking at the statistics. The producer must have a market. If he does not, two things will happen. He will become bankrupt or he will cease to attempt to produce. Suppose, for instance, the producers of the country were to go on a strike and say, "If you insist upon putting us on a par with the producers of other countries, where the people live under other laws, where the relation of the people to the government is different from that occupied here, we will not play, we will not raise the wheat, we will not cut the timber, we will not mine the ores nor smelt them; we will all buy bread and meat until our pocketbooks are empty and our credit gone."

In the meantime the means of production in this country would have fallen into ruin. The farms would have grown up with weeds and the fences would have strewn themselves over the fields; the machinery would have rusted; the buildings would have become unfit for use. And then the people would say, "Why is it we are paying under this system more for things purchased abroad (even if they had the money to purchase them) than we used to pay when they were produced at home?" The reply would be, "The foreign producer is looking for the best market in which to sell his goods, and as long as you have money and are not producing these things he will fix the price."

To-day we fix it. He, then, would fix it. His mills would be kept bright and in working order. His fields would be raising grain and other food products, and we would either pay for them at his own price or adopt some other remedy, or the surplus of our people would go to foreign countries in order to share in their prosperity, like people are talking about going to Canada. They would go to Germany or England or to whatever country was getting such good prices for the products we had to have in order to make a semblance of existence. You are playing right into the hands of the foreign producer when you are diminishing the inducement to produce at home.

Now, you can take that as the gospel of government. More than half the people of this country live in the country. The percentage, I am sorry to say, between the urban and country population, is growing the wrong way. More than half the people live in the country. They produce all that is produced that goes to make up or meet the necessities of the human family in this country except what we may import. They produce all that the city buys to sustain life. The city produces nothing, contributes nothing to the necessities of life, so far as concerns food products or clothing or the raw material out of which these things are concerned. Some shops are in the city, and they card and spin the wool and make the cloth and convert it into clothing, but those are unproductive wage earners. They contribute nothing to the necessary supplies of the people—not even to their own.

You can starve any city in the United States within 10 days by cutting off its transportation. If the country were to withdraw from the business of supplying the cities with their absolute necessities for 10 days, the people would either have to leave the cities or engage themselves in small industrial enterprises or starve. Two days will deprive New York City of the supply of milk and butter that it consumes, and the country holds the prices within the grasp of its own hand. A few days would deprive the cities of all their meat supplies, and in doing that you would shut down every workingman in the cities. You would put every occupation out of business in the cities.

Now, are you going, by a policy of government, to impoverish the country and make it either resentful or unable to contribute to the existence of the cities when the balance of population is so close between them? The country people can eat enough of their products to sustain their lives. They can equip themselves to make their own clothes, just as their ancestors did. Some of us remember when the spinning wheel was still an active factor in the household; and I saw the other day, in passing through a near-by country, the old weaver's house and the looms in it that were an active factor in contributing to the make-up of the daily life when I was a boy.

Now, if these things are silenced or put out of business, what becomes of the city population in this country; and that is where poverty counts most? A man may be very poor in the country and still not be destitute. There are resources for the man living in the country that do not exist to the man living in the city, and when I say man I mean man, woman, and child. The country finds the market for its surplus only in the cities. It consumes just what it needs and then it sells its surplus to the cities.

There is the relation that exists between the two elements of our own people. That is just as true when applied to our Nation in its dealings abroad. We consume a proportion of our products equal to our necessities, our comforts, or our luxuries, and when we have consumed that much of it we look out for a market for the surplus.

Neither this country nor the people of this country gain a dollar in wealth by what they consume. The people of the United States, taken as a whole, do not add a dollar to their wealth by what they consume. One man may get a little the better of another in a trade when he trades one commodity for another, but the people as a whole—and I am dealing with the question of the people, for we are here legislating for the people in the aggregate—are not a dollar richer by what we produce if we consume it, but the addition to the wealth of the country comes solely from the sale of our surplus abroad—the sale of our surplus and the acquisition of new money that represents the price of it. That is our added wealth. That is the balance of trade.

The Government is not interested in the balance of trade as a political body. The customhouse does not add to the wealth of the people. It is the difference between the sale and the purchase abroad that represents the increase or the decrease of the wealth of the people. That is where the tariff legislation begins. The tariff has no application whatever, except to the surplus of our products, and that surplus depends upon whether or not we produce more than we need; whether or not our people are profitably engaged. There would be no surplus if we were to allow more to be imported than we exported. The purpose of tariff legislation as it was originally applied to our Government is that we may keep out of our market the stranger so long as we ourselves desire to occupy that market.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may not have understood the Senator from Idaho correctly. I will repeat it, and he will tell me whether I understood it as he meant it. I understood him to say our wealth is measured by the difference between our exports and our imports.

Mr. HEYBURN. Our income is measured by the difference. That is, the question whether we are making or losing money is measured by the difference. What I call the still wealth is the wealth that stays at home. I was not speaking of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I misunderstood the Senator. I understood him to say that we grew richer only in the proportion of our balance of trade.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator misunderstood me. I said the increase in our wealth as a Nation depended upon the difference between our purchases and sales abroad.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems that the Senator from Idaho is repeating it just as I understood him to say it originally. I saw a map on the wall here the other day, introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which stated that in 1897 the national wealth was, as I recollect the map, $77,000,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. That has nothing to do with the exports and the imports.

Mr. CUMMINS. And our national wealth now, according to that map, is $140,000,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. An increase of $63,000,000,000 since that time.

Mr. HEYBURN. That might be at home.

Mr. CUMMINS. I call attention to the fact that our balance of trade has not been even a small tithe of that increase.

Mr. HEYBURN. That wealth to which the Senator from Iowa refers might be at home. I was speaking of the balance of trade as business men understand it—the difference between the outflow and the income. I was speaking of it from the standpoint of all the people constituting a nation and not taking into consideration at this time individual fluctuations. That is the rule of profit and loss in individual transactions as it is in national transactions.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator agrees that the country might be very rich and yet suffer a balance of trade against it for years and years.

Mr. HEYBURN. For a certain time.

Mr. CUMMINS. And all the time for that matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. An unfavorable balance of trade long continued would, of course, mean that the people would ultimately be bankrupt, just as it would with a business man. If at the end of every year a business man, in casting up his balances for the year, finds that he has paid out more than he has taken in, of course it is only a question of time until he will be bankrupt. The same is true of the whole people as it is of an indivdual. It is to that I am looking in all this tariff legislation. I am looking to the conditions that control the question of the balance.

Now, if we do not manufacture or produce upon the farm or from the mine or wheresoever it may be a surplus over our own consumption at home that we may sell abroad, we have no other way of making money. There is no way by which the whole people can add a dollar to their wealth except by producing and disposing of a surplus. That depends upon whether the people are in a positon to continue production.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would follow, if all the people in the world were citizens of one nation, that no matter what they might do or how diligent or industrious they might be or how great their resources, they would continually grow poorer.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they would consume what they produced and probably would produce what they consumed, but I never would deal with the question from that standpoint. We are a great, big, wealthy Nation, with boundaries about it, and within those boundaries we do business. No man does business in his neighbor's store—that is, on his own account. We are not transacting business in other countries. We may do business with other countries, but our great field of production lies at home. We do not produce our wheat in any other country than our own, nor our cattle nor our forests nor our manufactured products. We must produce them here, under the jurisdiction of our own Government. That fact is settled.

I have heard the utopian idea of wiping out the boundaries between nations and then devising some scheme of government by which the people thus constituted and situated might live. I have never spent a moment's thought about it, because it is an impossibility and will always remain one. So why waste our time in the consideration of a real question by conjuring up a condition or a situation that can not ever confront us?

Mr. President, I wish to have the attention of the Senator from North Carolina. I understood he suggested that about this time the bill would be laid aside, so far as concerns discussion. I am not through at all, but I am willing, if the Senator in charge of the bill has any such suggestion, to acquiesce in it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think we ought to go on with it until at least half past 5, but if the Senator prefers to discontinue now I suggest that we proceed to the reading of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that there have been times when I have felt physically better able to continue than I do this afternoon.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator understands I do not wish to press him at all.

Mr. GORE. I intended to propound a question to the Senator, but if he is indisposed I will defer it to some other time.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I am to go on, certainly the Senator can propound any question, but I thought we had a tacit understanding that at about 5 o'clock we would proceed to other business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask if the bill is now being read for amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; not for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want a clear understanding. I propose at the right time to offer an amendment by way of a substitute for the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that after the reading of the bill any amendment or substitute will be in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been no amendment pending, I understand.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely again call attention to the fact that this is not one of the prescribed readings of the bill. This is a reading as in Committee of the Whole. It does not take the place of any other reading, nor does it cut out——

Mr. SIMMONS. It is to save time; that is all.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not cut out amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then it is an unnecessary and useless performance.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill has to be read at some time, and I suppose we had just as well go on with the reading now.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will have to be read when it comes into the Senate. That is the only time when it must be read.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it will not facilitate business, I see no reason for reading it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not, either.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that it is usual to have a reading as in Committee of the Whole for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had understood that to be the usual practice, and therefore I suggested that it be read this evening in order to save time, as no other Senator was ready to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to give notice that at 2 o'clock to-morrow, or if the 8-hour bill shall have been disposed of before that time, immediately after the disposition of that bill I shall ask permission of the Senate to submit some remarks on the pending metal schedule bill.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE, ETC.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) making provision for the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, on page 2, to strike out lines 1 to 8, inclusive, in the following words:

That for the necessary expenses of the meeting in the United States of the International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, including a tour by the foreign delegates of the principal commercial, industrial, agricultural, and social centers of the United States, for the purpose of acquainting them with our institutions and enterprises, $50,000 be, and hereby is, appropriated.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Governments of the commercial nations of the world an invitation to be represented officially at the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, to be held in Boston, Mass., September 24 to 28, 1912.

That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to ask the Governments of the commercial nations of the world to notify the leading business organizations of their respective countries of this action by the Congress of the United States of America, and suggest their cooperation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF LANDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 139) authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. It is a matter that the Senate has passed twice and we might as well dispose of it to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in section 3, page 2, line 24, before the word "million," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to make present and future provision for the erection and maintenance of public buildings for the accommodation of the Government of the United States within the District of Columbia, the following parcels of land shall be purchased, under the direction of the President of the United States, or taken for public use by due process of law, namely:

All of blocks Nos. 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 292, 293, 294, 295, 349, 350, 380, 381, 382, 461, 575, 576, Reservation A, Reservation B, Reservation C, Reservation D, Reservation 12, according to the official plat of the city of Washington, not already owned in whole or in part by the Government of the United States of America.

SEC. 2. That any and all streets and alleys intersecting the said lands so to be acquired as aforesaid may, at such time as the President may deem necessary or expedient, be by executive order vacated and become and constituted a part of the tract of land so provided to be acquired as aforesaid and subject to such other and further division and subdivision for the purposes of buildings or use as streets, alleys, passageways, or avenues as may be or become necessary in connection with the enjoyment of all of the said lands hereinbefore mentioned for public purposes.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $15,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used for the payment for or on account of the price of said lands or acquiring the title thereto, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to the executive order of the President, shall be authorized to purchase or acquire said land or any part thereof as soon as practicable at such price as may be fixed by agreement between the said Secretary and the respective owners of said lands and premises, not exceeding the actual cash value thereof, and the payments therefor shall be made to respective owners of such lands upon the requisition of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, upon a release and conveyance of said lands to the United States by good and sufficient deeds so conveying the same after the title of the grantor of said lands shall have been examined and approved in writing by the Attorney General of the United States.

SEC. 5. That in the event of a failure to agree upon the price of said land or any part thereof between the owner of said land and premises and the Government of the United States, the Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to commence and prosecute proceedings for the condemnation of said lands and premises in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia at any general or special term thereof, and to prosecute such proceedings in condemnation in the manner heretofore provided in the statute. That upon the final determination of such proceedings in condemnation, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make payment of the sum of money adjudged to be proper compensation on said land and premises so condemned out of the moneys hereinbefore provided to be appropriated for such purposes.

SEC. 6. That in condemnation proceedings so instituted and prosecuted as aforesaid the value of the land and the value of the buildings or improvements thereon shall be separately estimated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVY RETIREMENTS.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 473) relating to Navy retirements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "service," to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no increase of pay or allowance shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any officer of the United States Navy who served creditably during the Civil War and whose name is now borne on the list of retired officers of the Navy shall have the benefit of all laws in the same manner and to the same extent as though such officer had been retired for disability incident to the service: Provided, That no increase of pay or allowance shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment. The bill applies to only six officers. There are two officers provided for who are not cared for by private acts. The other four have been provided for. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "the passage of this act" and inserting "June 29, 1906," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no increase of pay or allowance shall accrue prior to June 29, 1906.

That will cover the case of two officers who have not heretofore been taken care of by private bills.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 24, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 23, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the great thoughts, noble deeds, and splendid achievements which link the past to the present, making us rich in scientific, literary, art, governmental, and religious attainments, which make the world a better place in which to live, affording greater fields of endeavor, opening the way to larger life and nobler attainments. Help us to add something to coming generations which will enlarge their opportunities and hasten the coming of Thy kingdom to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The leading editorial in the Washington Herald of yesterday, entitled "The Lodge amendment joker," among other statements, contains the following statement, which is not only absolutely untrue, but also reflects, in my judgment, upon the integrity of every member of the select committee appointed by this House at its last session to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co. and others.

The portion of the editorial to which I invite especial attention reads as follows:

THE LODGE AMENDMENT JOKER.

Those who are endeavoring to steer sugar legislation in Washington must be well-nigh distracted over the outcome of a year and a half of sugar agitation. Here is the result:

1. Hardwick report favoring the refiners and standpatters.
2. Underwood bill against the refiners and antistandpatters.
3. Senate finance report favoring the beet-sugar industry, but against the sugar refiners.
4. Lodge amendment, reported from the Senate Finance Committee, for the cane-sugar refiners and against the beet-sugar industry.

The Hardwick investigating committee reported that the value of the listed sugar-trust stocks was not inflated and that there was no "joker" in the law in favor of the cane-sugar refiners. In other words, it was a whitewash. The Democratic "steam roller" in the House lost no time in making it known that it disregarded the Hardwick report, and as a result the Underwood free-sugar bill was offered.

It will be observed that this editorial states, so far as the special committee is concerned—

The Hardwick report favors the refiners and standpatters.

Exactly the reverse is true. When the report was made its most bitter criticism came from the trust—the American Sugar Refining Co.—which company, in a statement issued by its counsel, Mr. James M. Beck, of New York, on the day after the report was made to the House, bitterly and, I believe, unjustly assailed the report as unfair to the greatest of the refiners. In what possible way the report could have given comfort to any so-called "standpatter" I challenge any mortal man to state. If the assertion of the Herald means that the report favored the standpatters because it contained no recommendation as to tariff legislation on sugar, then that paper stands convicted of crass ignorance. It must acknowledge that it has never even read the resolution under which the committee was raised—under which it acted—and in which resolution no jurisdiction whatever of the tariff question was given the committee. The committee did not report on the tariff, because in the unanimous opinion of every Member, Democrat and Republican alike, the House had given it neither instructions nor authority to so report. That this House and the public may see how unfounded is this criticism, I will read to the House the terms of the resolution under which the committee was raised:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members, to be elected by the House, be, and is hereby, directed to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there have been violations of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the various acts supplementary thereto, by the American Sugar Refining Co., incorporated January 10, 1891, under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and the various corporations controlled thereby or holding stocks or bonds therein or whose stocks or bonds are held, in whole or in part, thereby, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, which said violations have not been prosecuted by the executive officers of the Government.

Said committee is also directed to investigate the organization and operations of said American Sugar Refining Co., and its relations with other persons or corporations engaged in the business of manufacturing or refining sugar, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, and if in connection therewith violations of the aforesaid laws are disclosed, to report same to the House.

Said committee shall also inquire whether the organization and operations of the American Sugar Refining Co. and other persons or corporations having relations with it, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, have caused or had a tendency to cause any of the following results:

First. The restriction or destruction of competition among manufacturers or refiners of sugar.

Second. An increase in price of refined sugar to the consumer or decrease in the price of sugar cane or sugar beets to the producer thereof.

And said committee shall report to the House all the facts and circumstances disclosed by the investigation herein provided, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

And said committee as a whole, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit during sessions of the House and the recess of Congress, to employ clerical and other assistance, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpœnas during the recess of Congress.

So far, the editorial criticism of the Herald upon the committee is so weak and trifling that if it went no further I could well afford to disregard it, but the editorial continues:

The Hardwick committee reported that the value of the listed Sugar Trust's stocks was not inflated.

The truth is that the report was exactly the reverse. I read from page 25 of the report:

Your committee confidently submits from the above instances that its estimate in an earlier part of this report that of the nominal fifty millions of capital of the old refineries company not over twenty to twenty-five millions was real value, the balance being "water."

The capital of the American Co., organized in 1891, was also fifty millions, half common and half preferred. It appears to have taken over the properties of the Sugar Refineries Co. at a ratio of par, or somewhere near that figure. At par, according to the testimony of Mr. Heike. (Hearings, p. 187.) At something a little less than that figure, according to Mr. Atkins (hearings, p. 118), issuing, pro rata, about forty-two millions of its stock in place of the forty-seven millions actually issued by the refineries company.

So that the American inherited from its predecessor, the Sugar Refineries Co., most, if not all, of the water that had been so liberally pumped into the stock of the latter company.

In 1892 the American increased its capital stock from fifty to seventy-five millions, using the increase to purchase its Philadelphia and Baltimore competitors, as already outlined in this report.

It paid, in stock, $10,000,000 for the Spreckels plant that had cost only four and a half millions in cash. (Hearings, p. 2347.)

The Franklin, that was not worth over five millions at the outside, and probably less (hearings, pp. 1377–1378), was bought for ten millions in stock. It is worthy of note that at the time of these transactions, or during the same year at least, common stock of the American sold as high as 114 and preferred as high as 107. So it appears that up to its seventy-five millions capital mark the American Co. easily maintained its inherited ratio of two dollars of stock to one of real value.

So far as we have been able to discover, the further increase of stock of the American in 1901 from seventy-five to ninety millions was not marked by anything like the same degree of overpayment by the American. The mania for overcapitalization seems to permeate the sugar industry in every direction. The American, with its stock originally 40 to 50 per cent water, has paid the following dividends since its organization.

On preferred stock (one-half of whole) 7 per cent from 1891 to date. (Hearings, p. 2523.)

On common stock (one-half of the whole):

	Per cent.
1891	8
1892	9
1893	23
1894–1899	12
1900	6½
1901–1910	7

In other words, from 1891 to date the preferred has paid 7 per cent and the common has averaged 9.4 per cent, or both have averaged 8.2 per cent on the whole stock issue—at least 15 per cent to 16 per cent on a fair valuation of the properties and business.

Now, take the two largest competitors of the American—Arbuckle Bros. and the Federal.

Let me again cite the report (pp. 31–32) on this subject:

To summarize this portion of our report, we find strikingly developed in the sugar industry several evils, aside from the primary one of stifling competition, which seem to demand careful consideration and remedial legislation by Congress.

1. Original overcapitalization of great industrial corporations, resulting in increased cost of production if a profit is to be made (as is always insisted upon) on the inflated capitalization, and higher prices of the product to the consuming public.

2. The temptation of the persons who organize and control these large corporations to earn dividends on watered stock as soon as possible, so that such stock may be unloaded in the open markets upon the investing public. These dividends can rarely, if ever, be made without increasing prices to the consumer.

3. Exploitation not only of the consuming public and of the investing public, as already set out, but also of the corporations themselves, by their officers, directors, and trustees, who do not hesitate to overburden the consumer, to deceive the investor, and to take advantage of the corporations that have trusted them whenever it will line the pockets of such individual trustees.

Again, the editorial states the committee found "there was no joker in the law in favor of the cane-sugar refiners."

There is no such finding anywhere in the report, direct or indirect, express or implied. The man who wrote this editorial charge must have been either grossly careless or densely ignorant, or probably both. Having finished its specific misrepresentations of your committee, this intelligent and well-informed journal, published here in the Capital City, where its opportunities for acquiring accurate knowledge are great and its excuse for misstatements about matters of this kind small, undertakes to make a few general statements, or rather misstatements, on its own account.

Generalizing, it exclaims, "In other words it (the report) was a whitewash."

Mr. Speaker, I prefer to be charitable in my answer to such libels as this. I rarely notice them and only do so when the injustice is intolerable. Even then, unless I know the motive of the critic to be bad, I prefer to ascribe his misstatements to ignorance rather than malice. But I must say, Mr. Speaker, in justice to myself, in justice to every member of that committee, that a grosser misrepresentation was never made to the public than the statement that this report was a "whitewash" of any kind of anybody. No intelligent man can read it and say so. The report speaks for itself.

Let me inquire how or from whom did the Herald obtain the idea that the report was a "whitewash"? Not from the report itself. Then was it from the Sugar Trust, that protested most vigorously that the report was so far from a "whitewash" that it did the trust grave injustice? Or was it from the beet-sugar manufacturers, whose Washington agent, Mr. C. C. Hamlin, published columns in denunciation of it? Or from the Louisiana cane planters, whose papers and associations were most bitter in their condemnation of it?

But, Mr. Speaker, after having been so unjust to the men who devoted almost a year of their time to laborious and faithful work in an earnest and honest effort to carry out the mandate of the House on this question, the Herald continues:

The Democratic steam roller in the House lost no time in making it known that it disregarded the Hardwick report, and as a result the Underwood free-sugar bill was offered.

Not only is the above statement untrue in word, in letter, in substance, and in spirit, but the exact reverse is true, and no one knows it better or will bear witness to it more willingly than the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and every one of his Democratic associates on the Ways and Means Committee. So far from the work of the special committee being disregarded, the truth is that the facts disclosed by the hearings of the special committee were the principal weapons employed by the Ways and Means Committee in making up its report in favor of free sugar, and but for the work done by the special committee we would have no free-sugar bill in all probability.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to make any further remarks on the gross injustice that this editorial, evidently born of careless ignorance, does to every member of the committee. This whole House, Democratic and Republican Members alike, knows the truth. Your committee needs no vindication at its hands. Nor will it lack any at the hands of any honest man who will examine the work of the committee, read its reports, and read the debates of this House on the free-sugar bill. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR COMPLETION OF DAMS ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill H. R. 21969, on which the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, my object in rising was to finish a conference report we had up the other day. I understood from the Speaker I could do so at this time.

The SPEAKER. How long will it take?

Mr. ADAMSON. Just a minute. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wanted time to examine it the other day, and I will ask him if he is ready to dispose of it. It is Senate bill 5930. He makes no objection, and I ask that the conference report be adopted. The report was read the other day.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 5930. An act to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 729).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 5930) to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of the proviso beginning with the words "Provided further," page 1, line 13, down to and including the word "Engineers," page 2, line 8, so that the bill will read as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of Congress is hereby granted for the extension of the time allowed to the Twin City Power Co. to construct dams across the Savannah River, authorized by an act of February 29, 1908, until three years from the date fixed in the original act for its completion, to wit, February 29, 1916: Provided, That under the approval of the Secretary of War upon plans and specifications to be submitted, the said corporation may at its option develop its contemplated water power by the construction of one dam in lieu of two.

"SEC. 2. That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

And the House agree to the same.

W. C. ADAMSON,
F. C. STEVENS,
Managers on the part of the House.

KNUTE NELSON,
JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The Senate, in passing S. 5930, amended the same by adding in and after line 13, page 1, a proviso subjecting the extension asked for to the amendment of the general dam act approved June 23, 1910, the Senate being unaware that, in reliance upon the original grant, the grantees had made expenditures of money to a large amount, some two or three hundred thousand dollars, which, by the express provisions in the said amended act, exempt the extension from such limitation. The House amended that Senate amendment by excepting and exempting the extension from the proviso fixing the limitation of 50 years, which is really the principal provision in the amendment of June 23, 1910. The other provisions of that amendment have no application to the enterprise in question; therefore your conferees have thought it wise, in agreeing to the House amendment, to amend it further by striking out the whole proviso, beginning on page 1, line 13, so as to leave the bill as originally introduced by its author and leaving the dam to be constructed in accordance with the original grant, subject to the terms of the general dam act approved June 21, 1906.

W. C. ADAMSON.
F. C. STEVENS.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

PANAMA CANAL.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill H. R. 21969, and the previous question has been ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois place his amendment where he wants it in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I have an amendment pending to insert as a new section, I think to follow section 10, and the gentleman from Georgia desires to have it inserted at the end of section 5, and I ask unanimous consent that instead of going in as a new section the amendment may be offered to come in at the end of the Doremus amendment, if that be agreed to, or at the end of the original section 5, if that should be agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is agreeable.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new paragraph at the end of section 5:

"That the President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment of all claims arising out of personal injuries to employees thereafter occurring while directly engaged in actual work in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal or of the Panama Railroad, or of any auxiliary canals, locks, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, whether such injuries result in death or not, and may revise and modify such method at any time; and such claims, to the extent they shall be allowed on such adjustment, if allowed at all, shall be paid out of the moneys hereafter appropriated for that purpose or out of the funds of the Panama Railroad Co., if said company was responsible for said injury, as the case may require. And after such method shall be provided by the President, the provisions of the act entitled 'An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment,' approved May 30, 1908, and of the act entitled 'An act relating to injured employees on the Isthmian Canal,' approved February 24, 1909, shall not apply to personal injuries thereafter received and claims for which are subject to determination and adjustment as provided in this section."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia is agreeable to this amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] is to strike out, I believe, section 5 and substitute. Now, if this is to be added at this time to section 5, I take it that would not be covered by the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to strike out so as to include this item.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, whatever the result may be, that the gentleman's amendment may follow the section.

Mr. MANN. As a part of the section?

Mr. ADAMSON. As a part of the section.

The SPEAKER. Is the section this follows one that is involved?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir; but it follows as a result no matter which is adopted, because both the substitute and the original end just alike in the same language.

The SPEAKER. It is necessary to vote on this amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand, but we are placing it, that is all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that no matter what happens to the Doremus amendment that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois shall follow the section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Whichever one is adopted this follows.

Mr. MANN. This goes as a part of the section.

The SPEAKER. Does it follow it to its fate or in the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir; the issue is not involved in this; this should follow whichever one is adopted.

The SPEAKER. That is, in the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir; whichever one is adopted this stays in and follows it.

The SPEAKER. There is a good deal of difference in the two propositions. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that no matter which way the House votes upon the Doremus proposition the Mann proposition shall in the bill follow the Doremus substitute or the original section in the pending bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Reserving the right to object, let me ask the gentleman why we could not avoid the confusion by acting upon the Doremus amendment first and then letting the Mann amendment come in independently?

Mr. ADAMSON. We can, but there is not any confusion about it. The Doremus amendment ends just exactly like the present section ends, and all we have to do is to add this as an additional paragraph to the section, no matter which one is adopted.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A confusion may arise in the minds of the Members of the House in voting upon the Doremus amendment as to whether the vote would not include the Mann amendment also, and if the Doremus amendment were acted upon separately, and as the Mann amendment follows it, there would be no possible confusion in the mind of any Member of the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is clear the Mann amendment has nothing to do with the issue on the part of section 5.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, why would it not be better to number this section 5½?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is exactly in keeping with the latter part of section 5.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state this proposition, so that the House will know what it is doing. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] offered a substitute for a certain portion of the text of the bill, and it was adopted. And it is a matter of common rumor that somebody is going to call for a separate vote on this Doremus substitute. The proposition of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is that, no matter whether the Doremus substitute is voted in or voted out, the Mann amendment follows immediately after the Doremus amendment if it is voted in, and follows after that portion of the original text if the Doremus amendment is voted out. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. ADAMSON. I suppose that we can have a vote on all of them in gross, except one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put that question as soon as we get through with this. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. I demand a separate vote on the Doremus substitute to section 5.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands a separate vote on the Doremus substitute to section 5. If there is no similar demand as to any other amendment, the other amendments will be voted upon in gross. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the Doremus amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-seven Members are present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the Doremus amendment will, as their names are called, answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay," and the House will be in order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nays 128, answered "present" 8, not voting 109, as follows:

Mr. COPLEY (in favor of Doremus amendment) with Mr. LEVER (against).

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea" and I desire to change that vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma, and he answered "Present."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if Mr. RUCKER of Missouri has voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. DYER. I am paired with Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I voted "yea" on this amendment, but I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. DYER, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. Proceedings under the call will be suspended and the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to report the same back with the following amendment added to section 5 as amended by the Doremus amendment.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee with instructions to forthwith report it back to the House, striking out section 11 and inserting in lieu thereof the provision which I offer.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I made a motion to recommit, and I ask consideration of that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state what the situation is. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] and other gentlemen made a minority report against this bill. Evidently it is intended for the motion to recommit to be construed fairly.

The rule provides that the Chair shall give preference in recognition to some Member who is against the bill. These gentlemen made a minority report, and the Chair thinks in ordinary fairness in the construction of the rule that the gentleman from Louisiana should have precedence.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. The statement of the Chair is undoubtedly accurate, but the minority report having been adopted by the House, the amendment embraced in the minority report is a part of the bill. Therefore I am absolutely against the bill with the minority views carried into it, and the gentleman from Louisiana is for it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can settle that very easily. Is the gentleman from Louisiana opposed to the bill?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BROUSSARD moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with the following amendment to section 11:

"SEC. 11. From and after the opening of the Panama Canal it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water engaged in interstate commerce through the Panama Canal. And it shall be the duty of the President to exclude any such ship of commerce from the canal.

"That from and after the opening of the Panama Canal no ship engaged in interstate commerce which is owned, leased, controlled, or operated by any person, firm, association, or corporation engaged in any agreement, combination, ship ring, or conference with reference to rates, ports, routes of traffic, rebates, or terminal facilities, shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade through said canal, and it shall be the duty of the President to exclude every such ship of commerce from the canal.

"That any officer or agent of any railroad company or corporation, or any officer or agent of any ship or shipping company or any other person whatsoever, who is a party to any violation of this section or who knowingly violates or who permits any violation thereof, shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $10,000 or less than $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court having jurisdiction thereof."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will state his point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it is germane either to the section or to the bill. It proposes an entirely different system of dealing with these things. It is not the purpose of the bill to place on the management of the canal the burden of determining all questions about ships. It is the purpose of the bill to let the United States Government control the whole matter in connection with the coastwise trade and interstate commerce. This motion changes the system entirely and is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated yesterday in an opinion that was as carefully drawn as possible after great investigation, with the help of two of the best parliamentarians on the floor of the House, one on each side, filing a brief, that a motion to recommit does not have to be germane to any particular section if it is germane to the bill. The motion to recommit ought to be construed liberally so that it will do what it was intended to do. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that his inclination is to rule against the gentleman, but if he has any authorities to offer or any argument to submit the Chair will hear it with an open mind.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to offer on it; I simply suggested that it was such a radical change of the matter in the bill——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with the question of whether a proposition is radical or not.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that, but the provision pertains to the method of regulating the coastwise trade and interstate commerce.

The SPEAKER. The subject matter of this bill is treating with the tolls of the Panama Canal, is it not?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is one verse only of a very long bill containing many important provisions.

The SPEAKER. And the passage of ships through the Panama Canal?

Mr. ADAMSON. The subject of the bill is the operation of the canal with or without tolls and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone. The tolls make a very small part of it. One section in the bill deals with the interstate commerce, to improve the coastwise trade, and this proposes to change the whole system, eliminate all of these beneficial things, and in lieu thereof place upon the officers of the canal the administrative burdens of determining these questions.

Mr. MANN. Will the Speaker indulge me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but the Chair first wants to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question before the gentleman from Illinois begins. This bill treats of the subject of ships passing through the Panama Canal and the tolls, and changes somewhat some statutes?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is part of it; yes.

The SPEAKER. Does not the amendment included in the motion treat of the very same subject?

Mr. ADAMSON. It deals with that particular subject, but it changes the whole system.

The SPEAKER. That may be true, but the Chair has nothing to do with that. It might be the intention of the House to change the whole thing on a motion to recommit. The Chair can not pass on that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill first introduced as reported contained section 11 entirely apart in its theory from the balance of the bill and wholly unrelated to the matter of tolls in the Panama Canal. The committee reported a substitute for section 11 in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I made a point of order that the substitute reported by the committee for section 11 was not in order, because it was not germane to the bill and not germane to section 11.

The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, after examining the substitute and original provision in the bill, overruled the point of order and held that the substitute was in order. Now, it is very plain to any gentleman who has examined the bill, the substitute, and the motion to recommit, that the motion of the gentleman to recommit is far nearer germane to the original section 11 of the bill than was the substitute held in order by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I do not deny that his decision was correct. So that clearly the motion to recommit now offered by the gentleman from Louisiana is germane to the provisions in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to move to substitute for the motion to recommit the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The way to get at that is to vote down the motion for the previous question.

Mr. SIMS. The motion for the previous question has not been made.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the gentleman from Louisiana made a motion for the previous question, and then the gentleman from Georgia made a point of order against the motion to recommit.

Mr. SIMS. I did not know that the Chair had entertained the motion for the previous question. I hope it will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. SIMS. I am only expressing a hope. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SIMS) there were 149 ayes and 61 noes.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana to recommit with instructions.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I request that the amendment in the motion to recommit be again reported.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I object.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion to recommit be again reported. There has been so much confusion in the Hall that we have been unable to hear it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] just made that request, and it was objected to.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that section 11, as adopted in the Committee of the Whole, to which the substitute may be offered, may be read, in order that Members may understand upon what they are voting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to have section 11 read. Is there objection?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 63, nays 205, answered "present" 10, not voting 114, as follows:

Mr. DOUGHTON with Mr. KENNEDY.

Mr. BRANTLEY with Mr. KENDALL.

Mr. BATHRICK with Mr. HOWELL.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio with Mr. COPLEY.

On this vote:

Mr. FORDNEY (against) with Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH (to recommit).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VIOLATION OF CERTAIN RULES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to call the attention of Members to two or three rules that are constantly violated, thoughtlessly, no doubt, but the violation of them works absolute confusion. The Chair does this now when nobody is doing the particular thing that Members complain of.

Some of the Members are in the habit of crowding about the desk when a roll is being called. That is absolutely forbidden by the rules. We got into a considerable row at the beginning of the Sixty-first Congress about that very same thing.

There is a rule against smoking in the House. That ought to be enforced. [Applause.]

Further, the proper method of procedure when a gentleman has the floor and another gentleman desires to interrupt him is for that other gentleman to first address the Chair. Of course, the Chair cares nothing about that, except that that is the way to preserve order and keep down quarrels and fusses in the House. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LOBECK, for 2 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROWN, for 3 days, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. GRAY, for 10 days, on account of important private business.

WASHINGTON IMPROVEMENT & DEVELOPMENT CO., STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) to declare and make certain the authority of the Attorney General to begin and maintain and of any court of competent jurisdiction to entertain and decide a suit or suits for the purpose of having judicially declared a forfeiture of the rights granted by the act entitled "An act granting to the Washington Improvement & Development Co. a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington," approved June 4, 1898, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments with an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas moves to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each of said companies, as a condition precedent to approval of its right of way hereunder, shall pay such compensation for the taking or damaging of land and improvements of Indian allottees as the Secretary of the Interior shall find to be justly due from and hitherto unpaid by such company; and each of said rights of way is hereby expressly declared to be subject to the condition that so much thereof as shall not have been occupied by a completed railway at the expiration of five years from and after the date of the approval thereof under this act by the Secretary of the Interior shall ipso facto revert to the United States without any act of reentry or judicial or legislative declaration of forfeiture.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments with the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments, with the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, were agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to put in the RECORD a letter from the Department of Justice and one from the Secretary of the Interior to me in relation to this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Acknowledging your letter of the 13th instant, and responding to your request for a report concerning Senate substitute for H. J. Res. 142 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 6533 and 6534), I have to say that the legislation in its present form appears to be subject to the objection that it does not provide adequately for the protection of the Indian allottees, and makes no provision, in the interest of the public and the Indians, for the resumption of the rights of way in default of due diligence by the grantees in the construction of their respective railroads.

These objections, I think, would be removed by the addition of the following:

"Each of said companies, as a condition precedent to approval of its right of way hereunder, shall pay such compensation for the taking or damaging of land and improvements of Indian allottees as the Secretary of the Interior shall find to be justly due from and hitherto unpaid by such company; and each of said rights of way is hereby expressly declared to be subject to the condition that so much thereof as shall not have been occupied by a completed railway at the expiration of five years from and after the date of the approval thereof under this act by the Secretary of the Interior shall ipso facto revert to the United States without any act of reentry or judicial or legislative declaration of forfeiture."

As originally introduced the object of the resolution was solely to remove any doubt as to the authority of the Attorney General to maintain certain proceedings in Washington brought for the purpose of obtaining a judicial declaration of forfeiture of the grant made to the Washington Improvement & Development Co. As metamorphosed by the legislative process the measure now presents a subject of peculiar interest to the Department of the Interior but with which this department has little or no concern. The foregoing suggestions are therefore made subject, and in subordination, to such views as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to express to your committee regarding the resolution.

The opening sentence of the resolution is not all that could be desired in the matter of form, but suffices, I think, to express without obscurity the sense intended to be conveyed.

Respectfully (for the Attorney General),

ERNEST KNAEBEL,
Assistant Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 16, 1912.

Hon. JOS. T. ROBINSON,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

SIR: I have this day received letter from Mr. Ernest Knaebel, Assistant Attorney General, Department of Justice, enclosing me a copy of his report furnished you, dated to-day, concerning Senate substitute for sistant Attorney General, Department of Justice, inclosing me a copy of House resolution 142 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 6533 and 6534), authorizing and directing the Great Northern Railway Co. and the Spokane & British Columbia Railway Co. in the matter of their conflicting claims of rights of way across the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, in the San Poil Valley, and after careful consideration of the matter I approve of and earnestly recommend the adoption of the amendments, suggested in his said letter, to the pending resolution.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS,
First Assistant Secretary.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 20586, and to concur in the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 20586. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, there is one item in the bill where the beneficiary, Ada Mercer, has died and I would like to strike it out, but I do not know what page it is on.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is this a motion or a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It takes unanimous consent——

Mr. RODDENBERY. I desire to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri will hunt up that matter.

Mr. RUSSELL. Just let it go, as it will have to go back to the Senate if it is amended. The pension can not be paid, for the party has died. I ask to concur in the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to concur in the Senate amendments. Has this bill been referred to the committee?

Mr. RUSSELL. It has been referred.

The SPEAKER. It takes unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri why he desires to take the bill up at this time?

Mr. RUSSELL. Just to get through with it and get rid of it. The House Pensions Committee has agreed to concur in the amendment, and asked me to try to get it passed.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I shall object for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 24565, the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. PADGETT. And pending that I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate may be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] and myself, one-half to each.

The SPEAKER. And pending the motion the gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 24565, the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. HULL assumed the chair amid applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 24565, the naval appropriation bill, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume very little time in an explanation of this bill, as I think it unnecessary. The bill has been upon the calendar for several days, and the committee accompanied the bill with a report explaining fully and in detail the several provisions of the bill. I am in hearty sympathy and accord with the sentiment which I feel prevails largely in the body, that the supply bills should be expedited and gotten through the House and pass the Senate in order that legislation relating to supply bills may be gotten out of the way in order to expedite the general business and the final adjournment of the Congress. [Applause.] With that in view, I shall occupy but a few minutes' time. The bill carries an appropriation of $118,819,837.76, being $7,658,500.48 less than the appropriation bill as it became a law in the last Congress. [Applause.] The total estimates, regular and supplemental, and as contained in the hearings of the Secretary of the Navy, made the total estimates submitted to the committee $134,415,027.76, and, after mature consideration, the committee, as they have reported the bill, reduced the estimates $15,595,190. It will be noted that the amount recommended in the bill for the Naval Establishment, exclusive of the increase of the Navy, carries $112,872,137.76, as against an appropriation of the last Congress for the same purpose of $110,322,581.24, making the appropriation this year for that portion of the bill $2,569,556.52 greater. But I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Committee on Naval Affairs have included some new items in the bill which they thought very essential to have and very much needed, and which would be of great benefit not only to the Naval Service but to the country. They have reported 4,000 additional enlisted men, at an increased cost of $2,446,688.60; 400 marines, at a cost of $171,640; 13 Marine officers, at a cost of $22,630; enlarging the dry dock at Pearl Harbor, Hawaiian Islands, $650,000; a world-wide wireless-telegraph system, limiting the cost to $1,000,000 and carrying an appropriation in this bill for the first year's work, $400,000; to reimbuse enlisted men on U. S. S. Georgia, $4,300. This money was stolen by an assistant pay clerk, and we carry an appropriation to reimburse them. Ammunition for the new ships, we have added an additional $1,000,000 to this appropriation; modernizing the turrets, putting in a new system of hoisting apparatus for the ammunition for the ships, $250,000; modernizing projectiles, making the old projectiles equivalent to new ones and up to date, $300,000; battleship compasses, a gyroscopic compass, which is entirely new, $120,000; making a total for these new items of $5,365,188.10. Deducting the increase and crediting the bill with these new items in order to have a fair comparison with the appropriations of last year, it will show a reduction in the present bill of $2,795,632.08 in the Naval Establishment, exclusive of the increase of the Navy. These are the principal items.

There are some matters of legislation that the committee thought were proper and necessary. They are inserted in the bill in italics, and I think it would answer all purposes when they come up for consideration that the committee should make such explanation as may be needed. Unless some one desires to ask me some questions, I shall yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, in the estimate the gentleman has presented in his statement of $118,000,000, that does not include any battleships?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; there are no battleships provided for in the bill.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I understand that. In the estimate that you gave the House a few minutes ago of what the House appropriated last year, how many battleships were included?

Mr. PADGETT. None whatever. I said exclusive of the increase of the Navy, so that the comparisons were exactly on a parity, and then I mentioned the new items which this committee has included which were not in the bill of last year. The total appropriation of the bill of last year was $126,405,509.24.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And that included no battleships?
Mr. PADGETT. That included battleships.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Your bill does not include any battleships?
Mr. PADGETT. No.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Now, as a matter of truth, then, the expenditures of the Navy, according to this bill, have not been reduced?
Mr. PADGETT. I stated they were increased, exclusive of the building program; that they were increased $2,569,556.52; but I stated that of that amount $5,365,188.60 was for new items and an increase of the enlisted force.
Mr. TRIBBLE. I understood that thoroughly; but I do understand, furthermore, that you are giving this Congress an increase over the bill of last year, without regard to the battleships.
Mr. PADGETT. In certain items; yes, sir.
Mr. TRIBBLE. You are giving the Congress an increase in the appropriation, and yet you give no battleships?
Mr. PADGETT. Yes; for the service, exclusive of the increase of the Navy, but in the total bill a reduction of more than $7,000,000.
Mr. TRIBBLE. You increase the land appropriations. You increase all the appropriations that are land, and when you consider the sea you do not give any appropriation for fighting ships. Where is the fighting done, on the land or on the sea?
Mr. PADGETT. The biggest item of increase we are giving——
Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman does not answer my question. Is the fighting on the land or on the sea?
Mr. PADGETT. The Navy fights on the sea.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Is the purpose to increase the capacity of the Navy to fight on the land or on the sea?
Mr. PADGETT. We are increasing it here to fight on the sea, because we are providing for 4,000 additional men.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Where are you proposing for them to fight—on the land or on the sea?
Mr. PADGETT. On the sea. The enlisted men naturally belong to the ships.
Mr. TRIBBLE. I want you to explain to this House how you propose to increase the efficiency of the Navy by increasing the land force and cutting off everything on the sea.
Mr. PADGETT. We have not proposed that. I propose to increase it by enlisting 4,000 men for the Navy and 400 marines, every one of whom will be fighting men on the sea.
Mr. TRIBBLE. What necessity for all of this increase on the land, there being no increase of ships for sea service?
Mr. PADGETT. We have many ships. We are 20,000 men short now in the ships we have authorized and are under construction and built.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Permit me to say I am not favoring battleships at this time. You say you have not men enough and have not officers enough? I insist we have enough and more than enough. What do you say?
Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; we are short both in officers and in men.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Have you not got to take officers out of the Navy, because you have not room for them, and place them on the retired list?
Mr. PADGETT. According to the statement of Capt. Usher, last year, I believe it was, we were 30,000 men short, but by eliminating 97 of the small vessels from the Navy Register and bringing it down to date we are 19,500 men short. And we are proposing to increase the enlisted force by 4,000 in order to provide for the six monster battleships that are now under construction, so that when they are commissioned we will have some men with which to man them.
Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. And they will fight on the sea.
Mr. TRIBBLE. I will ask you if it is not a fact that you are asking this House to increase the official force of the Navy, and at the same time you are providing year by year to eliminate men and eliminate officers who are capable of fighting, who are competent to fight, and whose age does not prevent them from staying on the active list?
Mr. PADGETT. There is no provision whatever in this bill for eliminating anybody. There is nothing about the retirement except the provision with reference to the modifications of sections 8 and 9 of the personnel bill of 1899 under which officers retiring, either by selection or by voluntary retirement, would be promoted into the next higher grade and retired. This bill contains a provision that they shall retire in the grade in which they served and not in the promoted grade.
Mr. TRIBBLE. That is true; but you have a provision here giving more officers.
Mr. PADGETT. Thirteen; yes, sir.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Thirteen more officers?
Mr. PADGETT. Marine officers.
Mr. TRIBBLE. How many officers are eliminated by the laws which you have on the statute books, every year?
Mr. PADGETT. I do not know the number.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Well, 30, 40, 50, or 100?
Mr. PADGETT. I do not know. I have not looked over the list as to the number.
Mr. TRIBBLE. There are a number, are there not?
Mr. PADGETT. Yes.
Mr. TRIBBLE. And what efforts are being made to keep on the active list in actual service those officers that are competent but are being retired frequently?
Mr. PADGETT. None whatever, because the law provides they shall retire at the age of 62——
Mr. TRIBBLE. I have reference to men younger than that.
Mr. PADGETT (continuing). And that has been the law for generations.
Mr. TRIBBLE. Generations? Is the committee responsible for what the Republican Party has done for generations previous? Are we not responsible for what we do and not for other people?
Mr. PADGETT. I do not think the question of the Republican Party or the Democratic Party has anything to do with the Navy. It is a nonpartisan and a nonpolitical question. [Applause.]
Mr. TRIBBLE. I agree with the gentleman that it ought to be.
Mr. PADGETT. It is. [Applause.]
Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?
Mr. PADGETT. Yes.
Mr. SLOAN. I noted the gentleman's comparison between the appropriation which he submits and the bill of two years ago.
Mr. PADGETT. One year ago.
Mr. SLOAN. Has the gentleman a comparison with the similar bill at the same stage of the proceedings one year ago?
Mr. PADGETT. No; I compared it only with the bill as it became a law.
Mr. SLOAN. After it had passed this House, and then passed the Senate with such additions as the Senate saw fit to attach?
Mr. PADGETT. Yes.
Mr. SLOAN. But the gentleman has not a comparison of the amount submitted now with the amount of the bill that was passed by the House one year ago?
Mr. PADGETT. No; I have not. I have not looked that up. It was something like $125,000,000. I do not remember the exact amount, however.
Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to his colleague?
Mr. PADGETT. Yes.
Mr. AUSTIN. Can the gentleman give us the type of vessels enumerated, covering the new expenditures which the gentleman has mentioned?
Mr. PADGETT. We provided for two fuel ships, six torpedo-boat destroyers, and four submarines, at an estimated cost of $12,713,440, and then we provide also for the conversion of one of the colliers, the Prometheus, as named in the bill, into a repair ship at a cost of $350,000.
Mr. AUSTIN. Now, is it the opinion of the committee that the ships that the gentleman has just enumerated would be of more service to the country than an additional battleship?
Mr. PADGETT. Well, sir, I will say that not only the committee, but also the department thinks that we are very much in need of these auxiliary vessels. The department lays its emphasis upon battleships. The committee did not follow it in that matter for reasons that I suppose the gentleman is well aware of.
Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. PADGETT. Yes.
Mr. HOWARD. It is in connection with the question propounded by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE]. I notice a provision carrying an additional 400 men for the Marine Corps.
Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOWARD. Now, the provision for carrying 13 officers necessarily follows if these men are added to the Marine Corps?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. And that is the reason why these officers are asked for?

Mr. PADGETT. Exactly so.

Mr. HOWARD. One other question I would like to ask the gentleman now, because I would like to get the information. There is a provision in this bill to retire officers in the grade in which they come up for retirement. I understand the practice heretofore in the Navy has been that when an officer came up for retirement he was advanced one grade higher and then came in for three-fourths pay?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; that is the law of 1899.

Mr. HOWARD. As a matter of fact these officers have practically nothing to do with their retirement, especially in the Navy. They are plucked by a plucking board, as I understand it.

Mr. PADGETT. That is hardly an accurate statement. Under the law they retire when they reach the age of 62 years. Then some few are plucked and others voluntarily retire.

Mr. HOWARD. After 30 years' service?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. What does the gentleman think about the fairness of that proposition to those officers who are involuntarily retired, who have been plucked? They are probably as good officers as many others in the service. Does the gentleman think that is a fair proposition—to retire those officers in that grade without giving them this advanced rank?

Mr. PADGETT. The theory of the involuntary retirement is that there must be retirement if there is to be any promotion.

Mr. HOWARD. That is to help the "healthy" flow in promotion? That is what they term it?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. There must be promotion if you expect any young man to enter the Navy and devote his life work and service to the Navy. He must have some door of opportunity, and in order that there may be a door of opportunity to him there must be a flow of promotion, as in any business.

Mr. HOWARD. I agree with the chairman of the committee on that proposition.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, then, in order to make that promotion it has been found that the death rate is not sufficient to afford adequate promotion. Therefore the law provides that those who wish to retire may, under certain conditions, voluntarily retire, but if the number of deaths and the number of applications for voluntary retirement do not reach the number necessary to make this promotion, the law authorizes what is called, in common parlance, the plucking board to select, and the theory of that is that they should select those least efficient; not that they are inefficient, but that they are less efficient than some one else.

Now, as to whether or not in the administration of human agencies mistakes may not be made, that is a matter not the fault of the law but the fault of human nature. I am not here to argue or to say one way or the other as to whether there is or is not favoritism and whether there are not mistakes made, but the theory of the law is that they shall select the least efficient in the grades in order to make this promotion.

Mr. HOWARD. But, as I understand it now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. PADGETT. Yes——

Mr. HOWARD. Under the present rule and under the present law there are two beneficiaries: The man who retires receives the benefit, in that he is advanced a grade at the time of retirement, and the other beneficiary is a class of younger officers of the Navy who have to resort to this method in order to get promotion.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. No; the young officers do not resort to it.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course they do not resort to it, but the department resorts to it to give these young officers promotions.

Mr. PADGETT. It is the method provided by law for promotion.

Mr. HOWARD. That is all.

Mr. McKENZIE. Before the chairman takes his seat I wish he would make a statement giving us the reason why the committee changed the policy that has been in force for a number of years requiring the construction of one or two battleships each year. I would like to have him state to us the reason for not continuing that policy, whether, in the judgment of the committee, they felt that the Navy is now strong enough and that we did not need any more battleships, or whatever the reason might be that caused them to take this action.

Mr. PADGETT. The committee did not discuss the question of battleships. A motion was made and voted down. There was no discussion as to why it was done. I suppose the gentleman knows that there was a satisfactory reason.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. A reason, but not a satisfactory one.

Mr. MADDEN. The unanimity of the committee was largely due to the Democratic caucus instructing the Democrats of the committee not to vote for a battleship, was it not?

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman from Illinois can form his own conclusion on that matter; it was not discussed in committee.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman stated that an inducement must be given to the young officers in order to get them and keep them there; that is, to eliminate the old officers and make places for the younger ones.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and in the general policy there must be an age limit fixed after which it is not proper that a man should be kept in the service. Of course there may be individual cases where a man at 65 would be amply competent physically and mentally, and there might be others at 50 or 55 where a man would be less efficient than the man at 65, but the law fixes the general average at 62 and adopted that as a policy, and that has been in force for many years.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Let us leave the age limit and come back to the first proposition—that to which I am trying to hold the gentleman. Was it not testified before the Naval Affairs Committee by Capt. Smith that a man could be plucked after 12 years' service?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; but they are not.

Mr. TRIBBLE. They are all along the line, are they not, at all ages?

Mr. PADGETT. Under the regulations they have to have 30 years' service for voluntary retirement.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I know that is true in case of voluntary retirement, but I am speaking of the plucking board.

Mr. PADGETT. The number selected by the plucking board is usually small in proportion to the total number of retirements.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Let us see about that question a little. Every boy who goes through the Naval Academy costs this Government $18,000. Is not that true? Eighteen thousand dollars is the expense of a boy at the Naval Academy who graduates.

Mr. PADGETT. That has been stated in a number of ways.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Is it not a fact that there are thousands upon thousands of boys who would like to go to the Naval Academy? There is no trouble about a man going there and going through if he can get in.

Mr. PADGETT. There are a great many that want to go there; there is always a small per cent that pass the examination—I think 37 to 45 per cent pass examination successfully. Then after they enter I think there is about 60 per cent graduate.

Mr. TRIBBLE. They are there, and you have put into a man that is there $18,000, and then you pay him a good salary from the day he leaves there until the day you decide to pluck him. He is a good, capable man, no charge against him, age 45, as an illustration. Will you give us any reason for taking this man out of the service, except that you want to make a place for somebody else who wants to be promoted?

Mr. PADGETT. That is all.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Now, is there any business concern in this country, any bank, any manufacturing concern, any enterprise, that would eliminate a good, capable man on large retired salary for the purpose of making a place for someone else who simply wanted to be promoted?

Mr. PADGETT. The comparisons between a bank and the Navy are so diverse and different that it will be impossible to make a fair and just comparison. As I stated a moment ago, if you get young men to enter the Navy, if you expect desirable young men to enter the Navy, they must have an opportunity to do something, to accomplish something, and to have somewhat of a career. If you arrange it so that a man who enters the Navy, a bright boy, an intelligent boy, an energetic and desirable boy, if he is to remain an ensign all his life he will not go into it. If he could not have the prospect of promotion and have a career and accomplish something, you might as well give up the Navy.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The testimony was before the committee, and does not the gentleman admit it to be the fact, that there are many officers in the Navy capable and ready to fill all official positions and many more without providing for new enlistments at the expense of the people?

Mr. PADGETT. But what if they can not get the higher position?

Mr. TRIBBLE. They are not quitting, are they?

Mr. PADGETT. There is an open door and a prospect for promotion.

Mr. TRIBBLE. You have got more than you can use?

Mr. PADGETT. No; we are short in the Navy.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Why are you short?

Mr. PADGETT. Because we have not authorized the number necessary to man the complement of ships which we have.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Have you not a great many officers in the Navy, thousands of them?

Mr. PADGETT. No; we have about 1,800, and that would hardly come within the class designated by thousands.

Mr. TRIBBLE. If you are short, why eliminate good men; why take out good men and put them out into active life and pay them out of the Treasury of the United States—retired officers, living on the bounty of the Government—doing nothing?

Mr. PADGETT. Because it is a part of the general policy to effect promotion, to afford the bright young men inducement to enter the Navy. If they did not have that opportunity you would have no Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss].

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I expected to submit a few remarks on this bill at this stage of the proceeding, but I shall defer them in order to accommodate my friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], who is obliged to leave the city. I will yield to him 30 minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, this year the battleship qustion finds me in a state of mind bordering on equanimity, if not indifference. The reason is, probably, that everyone knows in advance what its final disposition will be. The majority in the House will uphold the action of the Democratic caucus by refusing new authorizations, the Senate will insist on at least one new battleship, and the House will finally yield to a program, so wisely limited, in order to keep the Navy at its present efficiency.

Now, if my friends on the other side were actuated by a higher motive than that of mere economy I could probably get up some enthusiasm. If they had said the United States is in the best possible position to set the world an example by calling a halt to the mad rivalry for excessive armaments, I would be tempted to take my hat off to them, but as it seems to be a question not of principle but of parsimony with them, a desire merely of making a showing, at the end of the session, of surplus cash rather than investments in behalf of the Government, I can not help but feel more or less unconcerned, although I must say that the action of the Democratic caucus has served one good purpose, it has saved us from the annual Japanese war scare. But, Mr. Chairman, there is another and more cogent reason why the friends of peace and arbitration view the question of naval armaments with less concern now than they did even a few years ago. They have seen the light break in. An antidote has been found for the folly of the nations, and it may now safely be predicted that it is only a question of a short time when, through the force of public sentiment, arbitration will take the place of war in the settlement of international differences and when the nations will march, figuratively speaking, from abandoned battle fields to the temple of justice, there calmly to await the verdict of impartial judges in every case which threatens to disturb their peace. While it is true that Governments can not be persuaded to discard their implements of war so long as they actually need them for purposes of defense and national security, it is just as certain that no nation would maintain them much beyond the period when their absolute uselessness, except for police purposes, has been demonstrated. Hence, I hold that the question of armaments will solve itself. Its proper solution will be the natural sequence of the perfection of the legal machinery for the administration of international justice.

It is this question which I desire to discuss to-day. If above premises are correct, then it becomes the patriotic duty of every good citizen by his vote and influence to hasten the day when in the intercourse of the nations judicial decisions will be recognized as the proper substitute for the arbitrament of the sword, proper because more humane, more civilized, and infinitely more economical.

Fortunately we are no longer in doubt as to how this great purpose can be accomplished. The consensus of opinion of the world's best thinkers is fixed upon three postulates, namely, general arbitration treaties, a high court of nations, and a code of international law to be sanctioned by all the national legislative bodies and enforced by the combined police powers of the world.

Thanks to the two Hague conferences, this plan is no longer a dream of visionaries or a vision of dreamers, nor is it the half-baked scheme of progressives who are overestimating the speed of rational advance. It is much more than that. It has become the concrete project upon which the Government of the whole world have concentrated their official minds ever since a President of the United States has had the courage and the foresight to propose the settlement by arbitration of all justiciable questions. [Applause.]

Before I discuss President Taft's arbitration policy let me show you how far the plan of a high court of nations has progressed. Such a court has been a reality ever since 1899, when the first Hague conference created it in the shape of a panel from which a court was to be organized in each given case. While this court has officiated in a number of important cases to the full satisfaction of the world's opinion, yet there was a general demand for a tribunal with real judicial powers, and this led to the unanimous declaration by the second Hague conference in favor of a court of arbitral justice. All the signatory powers represented at that conference assented to its immediate establishment, and only the question of the appointment, or, rather, the distribution, of the judges caused disagreement and has been the stumblingblock up to the present time in the way of its actual creation. There is no question, however, that the next conference of the powers, which will meet in Holland's capital in 1915, will remove this obstacle and crown its labors with what, in my judgment, will be the most glorious achievement of modern times. A code of international law to apply to the cases which may be brought before the court the same as an agreement as to the executive power to enforce, if need be, the decrees of such a world tribunal will follow its establishment just as surely as the lex scripta and the sheriffs became the creatures of domestic courts. It is needless to say that every arbitration treaty negotiated between two or more governments will form an integral part of the international code.

After this brief review of past achievements and aspirations for the future, let me discuss the most important event in the history of the modern peace movement, namely, President Taft's proposition to arbitrate all justiciable questions. I need not recount how this progressive plan electrified the world and how, through it, the United States suddenly assumed leadership in fact, and not in name only, in the great movement for international justice. The first to criticize was Theodore Roosevelt, and it is my purpose to answer, on behalf of the supporters of the arbitration treaties, the objections he raised against the President's great conception. I shall do so, of course, with entire disregard of the present political situation.

The former President insists that questions of honor and vital interest should always be excepted from the scope of arbitration treaties, because not to do that is to waive at the outset a possible arbitrament by the sword—would be hypocrisy and cowardice. No self-respecting nation, he says, would resort to arbitration when its honor is at stake, and, besides, such an agreement could not be enforced when a nation believes it has real cause for war.

This sounds good, and the unthinking, no doubt, will applaud the argument. But if it were to prevail, the world would forever be where it is to-day. Here Mr. Roosevelt is plainly the standpatter or reactionary, while the President is the progressive. The fact is that hypocrisy and cowardice are the characteristics of the present system rather than of the newly proposed. Under our present feeble treaties every controversy can easily be magnified to the proportions of a question of honor or vital interest; hence these old treaties making such exemptions are not worth the paper they are written upon, and therefore it was hardly compatible with upright and honorable conduct for nations to pretend favoring arbitration when in fact they knew they could open the door to war at any time they saw fit to do so.

In comparison with this hypocritical system which Mr. Roosevelt upholds, President Taft's proposal is the very embodiment of honesty. It presupposes honorable conduct on the part of nations, and is based on the rightful assumption that no nation conducting itself honorably need ever fear the verdict of an impartial tribunal. It is this consideration which prompted the President to say that questions of honor are really the easiest to arbitrate. The time is happily past when one civilized nation will wantonly insult another, and it is also true that in this time and day monarchical rulers can no longer use an alleged insult as a subterfuge to arouse, by appeals to the national honor, the furor of the people. A more frequent intercourse and more rapid communication between the people of different nations, and the growth of popular education and of a better understanding among them have become the reliable safeguards against such tricks. We must also remember that the great nations, in spite of their armaments, are no longer independent and hostile military camps frowning upon each other as implacable enemies, but they have gradually come to regard each other as interdependent parts of the great family of nations ready and willing to investigate, before cutting throats, whether an insult is real or fancied, or whether it was offered intentionally or not. And we know that war is always as good as prevented when consent is once obtained for an investigation.

Mr. Roosevelt justifies war from the feelings of an individual saying in so many words that nations should act just as a man would when his wife is assailed and has her face slapped. "Such an individual," he says, "who went to law instead of forthwith punishing the offender would be regarded with derision." This case belongs clearly in the category of self-defense, and no friend of peace has ever denied this to a nation. Defense presupposes an attack, but we must be sure that there is an attack before we are allowed to take the law in our own hands. If domestic law permits no exception to that rule, except in case of a physical attack, why should an exception be permitted in international law merely to continue the bloody business of war? We know full well that many cases of law violation occur because human passion is often stronger than respect for law, but surely this is no reason why there should be no law against certain offenses, nor is it a reason why exceptions should be recognized in international law framed, as it is, to safeguard the peace. To leave it to individual judgment when to resort to law or to force will lead to anarchy just as surely as it will lead to war if we leave such discretion to governments and nations. The prohibition of violence is the universal rule of law. The breaking of that rule, no matter how justifiable, is the breaking of law, and President Taft simply aims to apply this principle to international relations. The doctrine preached by Mr. Roosevelt of permitting exceptions would lead to the same intolerable conditions in domestic affairs as now exist in foreign relations, namely, that the arbitrary will of the individual can menace the peace of society. As the ruler can declare war at will on the plea of an injury to honor or vital interests, so could the individual citizen justify acts of violence because of want or hunger or misery or of personal insult. President Taft's proposition, therefore, to make the law of nations conform to domestic law is a step in advance from dangerous conditions of anarchy to a higher plane of international law and order.

Moreover, a resort to violence is the poorest possible way to resent an insult. War never settles a question of right or wrong; it only determines which side is the strongest, and might is not right. Therefore a trial by battle would be wrong even if all nations were equally strong. But how would it be if a weak nation would be insulted by a big and powerful one? Suppose Great Britain would offer an insult to little Holland, and to save their honor the Dutch people would decide to fight. What would be the result? We should see injury added to insult, and an unequal war between the two would most likely result in the complete annihilation of Holland. Would we be justified with charging the Dutch with cowardice when they prefer judicial decisions to a war which would inevitably wipe them from the map? The fact is they are just as brave as we are, but that does not carry with it the obligation to commit national suicide. Still less justifiable is the reproach of cowardice when a great and powerful country like the United States at a time of profound peace proposes to other great countries that all their future controversies shall be settled by arbitration. Such a proposition, on the contrary, seems the very acme of dignity, honor, and manhood, and every Government which values justice and is willing to forego illegitimate gain by force will so regard it.

Mr. Roosevelt cites the hypothetical case of an English or German or Japanese fleet "firing into our coast towns and killing and wounding citizens," and says, in such an event, "this Nation would immediately demand not arbitration, but either atonement or war"; but surely this is no argument against arbitration. In fact, our Government proposes arbitration to prevent just such contingencies. When a hostile fleet once bombards our coast towns, then the stage of arbitration is passed, and such bombardment would simply be a declaration of war as an evidence that arbitration has failed. But you notice that here again the ex-President cites a case calling for legitimate self-defense which has no application whatsoever to President Taft's plan. No nation will forfeit, by arrangements to settle its controversies peacefully, its inherent right of self-defense.

The importance of President Taft's initiative may not as yet be fully appreciated by the people. It will not come home to them until, as a result of such a policy, hundreds of millions will be annually saved to the taxpayers. All thinking men and women regard it even to-day as one of the greatest world reforms ever undertaken, and no one doubts its entire practicability. We may thoughtlessly repeat the phrase, "There must always be war," but I sincerely believe Taft's arbitration policy to be the beginning of its end, and we should all be happy to have lived to see the day of this great beginning through the initiative of an American President. Neither the Senate, which mutilated the arbitration treaties, nor Mr. Roosevelt, who has opposed them from the beginning, will be able to halt the triumphant progress of evolution. It is the manifest destiny of human civilization to found the world's peace on the rock of law and render it secure against the passion of the masses as well as against the arbitrary will of rulers. To popularize this great purpose through the sheer force of its own merit and to fructify it as a fixed policy of government I earnestly believe to be America's greatest mission in the politics of the world, and no good American will ever recognize either the Constitution or the Senate of the United States to be a lasting obstacle in the way of its accomplishment.

The friends of arbitration do not hug the delusion that war can be abolished with one fell swoop. They know that the idols of the tribe will prevail for a time against the ideals of humanity. It seems to be man's way to exhaust the possibilities of every folly and every iniquity before he will fall back upon the methods of wisdom and goodness. But even to-day the philosophy of history is able to characterize war as a blunder, ethics as barbarism, law as a crime, and religion as a sin. The world's hope is not a lie, and, in the language of America's greatest poet, "Man will not forever be the slave of his own passions." Moltke, it is true, declared that "Eternal peace is only a dream, however beautiful it may be." Yet a giant thinker of the same nation wrote an immortal treatise on the same "perpetual peace," and came to the conclusion that it is—

> No mere empty idea, but rather we have here a problem which gradually works out its own salvation, and as the periods in which a given advance takes place toward the realization of the ideal of perpetual peace will, we hope, become shorter and shorter, we must approach ever nearer to this goal.

Yesterday—

Says Walter Walsh in his great book "The Moral Damage of War"—

> Yesterday the saint aspired, to-day the poet dreams, to-morrow the sage will expound, and on the fourth day the statesman will embody in a bill.

At every rung on the ladder humanity has been assured the next step up will be impracticable, impossible, but the only prophesies that remain unfulfilled are those of pessimism and unfaith. Mr. Wiseman assures humanity she can never cross the red sea of war, but she kindles her flaming enthusiasm and comes to her new world, her Columbia, her land of peace. Faith is not a fool. She surveys all the obstacles, ponders all the difficulties, counts all the opponents, measures all the "impossibilities," and then sings serenely with Scotia's great national bard:

> For a' that and a' that,
> It's coming yet, for a' that,
> That man to man, the world o'er,
> Shall brothers be, for a' that.

[Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman, before he takes his seat, permit me to say that it is a source of great pleasure to me to have listened to his treatment in such an able way of the question of arbitration without mixing it up with the question of armament, and to say that I am happy to be able to agree with him thoroughly upon his speech to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, it affords me great happiness, indeed, to discover that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] and I have ever been able to agree upon a question of this kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. As an observation in connection with the gentleman's remarks, does he recall the expression used by Andrew Carnegie, "No man ever touched another man's honor. All honor's wounds are self-inflicted"?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do not recall those words.

Mr. BUTLER. Are they Andrew Carnegie's exact words?

Mr. BOWMAN. They are quoted as his words.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the inclusion therein of the ceremonies and the addresses at the unveiling of the tablet as a memorial to Dr. Crawford W. Long, the discoverer of ether, at the University of Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting certain remarks referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

[The addresses referred to will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG]. [Applause.]

Mr. GREGG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I shall try to-day to correct the statement circulated throughout the country by those afflicted with the battleship mania that the Democratic caucus, by deciding against any battleships this year, has placed the party in opposition to a Navy, and that a failure at this session to provide for two is a neglect of our national defense.

This is untrue, and those who make the statement, with the exception of those whose soul and interest are so absorbed in the Navy that they can not look at the matter fairly, do so unadvisedly or for partisan political purposes or in the interest of armor-plate and shipbuilding concerns, for we all know that these large concerns never fail to look after their own interests, and we further know that they can always find, both in individuals and newspapers, willing tools to serve their purposes. [Applause.]

We believe in an adequate and efficient Navy, but we do not believe that a Navy composed of battleships without officers or men and without the necessary auxiliaries is either adequate or efficient.

We favor correcting the folly of the past, in which everything has been subordinated to the battleship, and in adopting a rational, sensible course of suspending temporarily their construction, so that we can, without unduly burdening the people and without creating a deficiency in our Treasury, provide officers and men and auxiliaries sufficient to make every battleship a fully equipped fighting unit.

We believe that it is time for Congress to use a little practical, common sense and act on its own initiative, and not be governed exclusively by the opinions of naval boards and officers, whose education and training lead them into the error of supposing that every interest should be subordinated to the Navy and to their ambition to command and for promotion.

They naturally want these great floating palaces and look with disfavor upon torpedo-boat destroyers, commonly called destroyers, submarines, and other necessary auxiliaries—I do not blame them—it is the result of their education and environments. As said by Rear Admiral Mahan in a paper from which I shall quote later—they have been taught to place their trust in bigness and nothing but bigness.

Those who claim to be overwise on naval needs say we should construct 2 battleships a year. Why 2 rather than 1? Why 2 rather than 10? Two may be a program, but not a policy. They say we should have a Navy large enough to insure our peace.

If, by insuring peace they mean, and that is what they mean, that we should have a Navy so large that other nations will not dare attack us, then 10 is more logical than 2, for the sooner we obtain an intimidating Navy the better, if we are to rely solely upon the Navy. Our critics do not tell us what policy we should adopt as to the size of our Navy compared with those of other countries in order to be able to insure our peace by means of the Navy.

They preach and preach, but when their sermons are finished they have not told us what we must do to be saved.

The trouble heretofore has been that we have had no fixed naval policy, by which I mean that we have not decided what should be the relative size of our Navy to that of the other nations of the world.

If we should decide that it should be the largest in the world—however wild the idea may be—we would have an ultimate object in view and could gradually work up to it and do it systematically. If we decide that it should be next in size to that of England, then with that definite purpose in view we could work up to it.

The political party which believes we should burden the people with a Navy so large that it will intimidate other nations, and which believes in "securing our peace" by means of a Navy rather than by treaties, arbitration, and diplomatic negotiations, should have the courage to say so in its platform and take the responsibility before the people, who will have to bear the burden.

There are but two rational policies. If we are to look at it from an aggressive and world-power view—that is, if we are ready to say that it is our purpose to dominate the seas of the world and to intermeddle in all international affairs, and we are ready to seek, instead of avoiding, entangling alliances—then the proper policy to adopt is to construct a Navy larger than that of any other nation. That is what our critics want to do.

If, on the other hand, we want to give some assurance of sincerity in our professions that we prefer law, arbitration, and diplomacy to gunpowder and dynamite as a means of adjusting international differences; if we prefer by example to teach and induce other nations to call a halt in the construction of these floating monsters, rather than encourage them in it; if we would rather be the leaders in peace than in war; if we prefer the hum of industry to the rattle of musketry and thunder of cannons, then our policy should be the one we have followed so long, without danger to our national defense, and the one laid down in the last Democratic national platform, which declares:

> We believe that the interest of this country would be best served by having a Navy sufficient to defend the coasts of this country and protect American citizens wherever their rights may be in jeopardy.

This means a defensive and not an aggressive Navy. We should amply protect our coasts and harbors with comparatively inexpensive submarines and shore batteries, and have enough large fighting ships to "protect American citizens wherever their rights may be jeopardized," as we have so often done in cases of internal uprisings and disturbances in China and other nations.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the Constitution and Washington and Jefferson, like the battleship after a few years' use, are considered obsolete, but I like occasionally to recur to them like the old-time Christian, who is bewildered and confused by the new theologies of the day, loves to return to his Bible and get new courage for the battle of life and have renewed his hopes for the future. [Applause.]

So I will quote from Thomas Jefferson in regard to the first policy. He said:

> Wars must sometimes be our lot, and all the wise can do will be to avoid that half of them which would be produced by our own follies and our own acts of injustice, and to make for the other half the best preparations we can. Of what nature should these be? A land army would be useless for offense and not the best nor safest instrument of defense. For either of these purposes the sea is the field on which we should meet an European enemy. On that element it is necessary we should possess some power. To aim at such a navy as the greater nations of Europe possess would be a foolish and wicked waste of the energies of our countrymen. It would be to pull on our own heads that load of military expense which makes the European laborer go supperless to bed and moistens his bread with the sweat of his brow.

If to secure our peace it is necessary to adopt a policy of building such a navy as the greater nations of Europe possess, and thereby "foolishly and wickedly waste the energies of our countrymen and pull on our own heads the load of military expense which makes the European laborer go supperless to bed," the people should be put on notice that such is our intention, and should be fully informed as to the ever-increasing burden they are expected to bear.

The cry, "In time of peace prepare for war" may be a catchy slogan, but in its ultimate analysis it means that all nations at all times should be in a state of preparedness for war, which further means a mad rush to insolvency for every nation of the earth. [Applause.]

The appeal is made to the pride and martial spirit of our people in support of an aggressive Navy; but the appeal is never accompanied with a statement showing the enormous increase of expenses, nor with the suggestion that all this money is extracted by taxation from the pockets of the people.

To show how, even under our moderate program, these expenses have increased, I cite that such expenses have been as follows:

In 1880	$13,536,985
In 1900	55,953,078
In 1910	123,173,717
In 1911	126,478,338

If this money was raised by direct taxation, whereby every taxpayer would know just how much he was contributing to the payment of this gradually and immensely increasing expense, you would not find as many Navy jingoes on the floor of this House as you now find.

As said before, we have had no definite, well-defined policy, neither has our program of construction been rational and well balanced or symmetrical, but it has been to construct a spectacular rather than an efficient and homogenous Navy—a Navy for display rather than for fighting purposes.

Our policy is not to cripple the Navy, nor to be niggardly in providing for it, but we wish to make our Navy adequate and effective, which it is not to-day.

We are not opposed to battleship construction, when it shall have been settled what type is the most formidable, but we do object to building them even then out of all proportion to the auxiliaries which are necessary to the efficient and effective use of the battle fleet. We are sadly deficient in these auxiliaries, and we believe that wisdom dictates we should supply some of them and supply men to man what battleships we have before building more.

Mr. Meyer, Secretary of the Navy, on page 37 of his last annual report, shows that we have 33 battleships, and says with this number we are short of auxiliaries as follows:

8 battleship cruisers which will cost	$119, 822, 288
18 scout ships which will cost	64, 968, 200
82 torpedo-boat destroyers which will cost	88, 452, 600
6 tenders to destroyers which will cost	8, 616, 000
3 repair ships which will cost	3, 705, 750
5 supply ships which will cost	7, 125, 000
3 hospital ships which will cost	5, 100, 000
4 ammunition ships which will cost	4, 901, 000
12 fleet fuel ships which will cost	14, 487, 840
22 submarines which will cost	12, 852, 460
10 tenders to submarines which will cost	11, 710. 000

Notice that the Secretary of the Navy, when speaking of our own Navy, classes battleship cruisers as auxiliaries, but in his recent articles in the newspapers, when he desires to make an unfavorable comparison between our Navy and that of Japan, he classes battleship cruisers that Japan has as battleships. I think that is hardly fair. According to him, these cruisers in one case are auxiliaries and in another case they are battleships.

To supply the above-named deficiencies will cost $341,741,078. These figures as to cost are obtained from the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy and are the cost if constructed under the eight-hour law. These deficiencies are based on 33 battleships. We are now building four more which, when completed, will call for 16 destroyers which will cost $16,686,800 and 4 scout cruisers which will cost $15,237,600, and they will need about 4,000 men to man them, at an additional annual expense of $2,180,224. These items are mentioned in connection with the deficiencies, but they are not the only additional expense, for each battleship built increases the expenses in numerous ways, such as $1,000,000 for annual maintenance and many other ways.

Now, when you consider that the auxiliaries mentioned are absolutely necessary to make our battleship fleet efficient and to protect it from torpedo attack, does it not seem the part of wisdom to provide at least a reasonable number of them before we build more battleships, every one of which increases the deficiency? It is no excuse to neglect their construction because, as the Secretary of the Navy says, "These small vessels require less time to build than a battleship, and some of them may under stress be acquired by purchase," because even if the time to construct is less, they can not be constructed within the period of the probable duration of a war, as it takes about two years to build any of them. We might not be able to purchase any of them, and we can not afford to let our fleet of battleships be exposed to the torpedoes of an enemy while we are building torpedo craft to protect them, nor remain inactive until we can build colliers and supply ships to furnish them with fuel and ammunition.

During the last 20 years we have spent more than $1,600,000,000 for the construction and maintenance of our Navy, yet the Navy we have is not adequate and efficient, and will not be until we supply the above auxiliaries at a further cost for construction of $341,741,078, and without the addition of other men and officers, the shortage of which I shall discuss later.

Our mistake has been that we have expended vast sums of money upon the upbuilding of a top-heavy and spectacular Navy and have neglected the cooperative naval units, and the splendid battleship without these is, in the opinion of nearly all experts, almost absolutely useless. The policy of building expensive vessels and placing 1,000 men on each without taking the necessary precaution to protect them with torpedo craft, such as destroyers and submarines, is not only foolish but actually criminal.

On February 22 of this year the Navy League held its annual banquet at the New Willard Hotel. The main target at which all their shafts were directed was the action of the Democratic caucus in deciding to build no battleships at this session. They were not fair in their criticisms, for they assumed that we had stopped such construction. They were not fair enough to say that we contemplated only a temporary suspension until we could supply some of the necessary auxiliaries

I pause here long enough to call attention to the fact that we have leagues and service journals whose object is to impress upon Congress the necessity of spending large sums of money in building a Navy—and they mean Dreadnoughts when they say Navy—but there is no league or organization to protect the Treasury against such raids. [Applause.] Those who would further oppress the taxpayer have their organizations to accomplish that purpose, but those who foot the bills have no organization to protect themselves. This makes it our duty as their representatives to do it.

Most of the thought which has been given to the Navy heretofore has been in the interest of the personnel and matériel. It is high time some thought should be given it from the viewpoint of the taxpayer. [Applause.]

At this banquet of the Navy League one of the soul-stirring, applause-raising speeches contained the following:

> There is little danger of the United States being invaded, but she now has a larger rôle to play than merely the protection of her own territory. She can not remain passive while injustice is being done in any part of the world. She should announce to the world that she stands for justice to all, particularly the weak, and should be ready to stand back of her announcement.

There we have the real purpose of the Navy jingoes. It is to build a Navy not for the protection of our country, but to bully the rest of the world.

Lo! a greater than Washington has arisen. The substance of his Farewell Address was to advise us to mind our own business and keep out of all entangling alliances, which has for years been found safe and sound, but this greater than Washington advises us to build a Navy sufficient to mind everybody else's business and to carry by force to all parts of the world our own particular ideas of justice.

Every year, just at the time the Navy bill is being considered, with surprising regularity, certain inspired articles appear in some of our newspapers warning us of the danger of war, imminent war, with some other nation, and predicting dire calamities to us if we do not build more battleships. Germany was used as the bogieman after the close of the Spanish War up to 1905. This became so absolutely ridiculous that men with any sense became ashamed to use it, and it was dropped.

But their zeal was so great and the necessity so urgent to have some supposed enemy they went 5,000 miles across the Pacific and found Japan. They have been so insistent in their contentions that Japan is anxious and willing to pounce down upon us that they have actually frightened some of the timorous.

On February 25 of this year there appeared in the New York Herald an article from Capt. L. Persius, one of the most capable and best known of the German retired naval officers, in which he says:

> The Japanese Navy, far from being equal to that of the United States, is weaker than at the outbreak of the Russo-Japanese War. The then modern battleships are now obsolete. The ships captured from the Russians, rebuilt at a cost of more than $30,000,000 have very small fighting value, and the increment through new battleships is extraordinarily small.
> Only the battleships Aki and Satsuma, completed with almost record breaking slowness of construction in five years, can be considered modern ships, though they carry only four 12-inch guns instead of the usual Dreadnought armament, and it is extremely doubtful whether Japan's first two ships of the Dreadnought class, the Setsu and the Kawachi, will be finished in time to join the fleet this year.
> A first-class battleship cruiser is under construction in England, another has recently been started in Japan. These, with small cruisers, destroyers, and submarines, represent the total increase since the War with Russia.

The attempt to construct battleships in Japan has proved, according to Capt. Persius, a failure, due to the deficiencies of the Japanese steel works and the lack of technically trained workmen in the yards. In confirmation of this he cited the Japanese minister of marine, who, in a speech before Parliament, admitted that the foreign-built ships were superior to the Japanese built, and that the Government steel works were not up to requirements.

Comparing the Japanese and the American fleets, he finds that Japan has only 13 battleships, with a tonnage of 184,800, to oppose 31 American battleships, of 498,200 tons, with 6 more American Dreadnoughts under construction.

The financial weakness of Japan will, he holds, bar any extensive appropriation for naval purposes for years to come, and the United States need no longer fear for its Pacific possessions.

This statement, coming from such a naval authority and from such a disinterested source, completely controverts the idea that we are in any danger from an attack by Japan and puts to confusion those who have been urging it.

Some other bogie man had to be found, and a very enterprising reporter took up Germany again, and there was, on March 11, 1912, sent from Washington to the New York Tribune, the Philadelphia Press, and other newspapers, a sensational dispatch to the effect that Germany was attempting to violate the Monroe doctrine by negotiating with Colombia for the purchase of coaling stations. The story was avowedly based on the assertions of anonymous naval bureau chiefs. It was made a sensational first-page story. To show how thoroughly ridiculous this was to those who are able to restrain their fears so they can bestow a little sober thought on the matter, I will read the following caustic editorial from the New York Evening Post of March 12, 1912:

All England will breathe a sigh of relief this morning when there is cabled to its newspapers the discovery made known by the Tribune's Washington dispatches. On authority of some nameless persons in the Navy Department they announce that "the steady increase in the German fleet has been aimed at the United States, and that it is not Japan in the Pacific that we need to watch most closely but Germany in the Atlantic; that it is with her rapidly increasing battleships that we shall eventually have to try conclusions." So it is all for nothing that old England has been striving to hold her own with Germany's naval expansion, while her population, from Lord Roberts down, has given way to one panic after another lest under the cover of a fog a German army corps descend upon her coasts. It thus appears that Kippling has been warning his nation in vain, and the very British babes have left their cradles for nothing to take up arms. Why, this profound discovery will revolutionize European diplomacy in a moment, make possible the limitation of armament, and relieve the military strain of the whole Continent. Fortunate Tribune! Glorious news! But what becomes of our friends the Japanese? Ever since they supplanted the Germans after 1905 as the bogey man to be trotted out on every occasion as a means of boosting the big Navy appropriations they have served our Navy jingoes faithfully and well. Is it possible that as bogey men they have lost their value and we are again to have a series of German scares?

Like all false prophecies, these prophecies of war, "When they hit, it is history; when they miss, it is mystery." [Applause.]

It is asserted by some that the resolution of Senator LODGE inquiring of the administration whether Japan has acquired a naval base on Magdalena Bay, Mexico, was introduced for the purpose of affecting the naval program at this session and aiding his friend, Secretary of the Navy Meyer, to secure two battleships. Suppose it had developed that Japan had acquired it, what would we have done? Authorized the building of more Dreadnoughts, at this session and wait about three years until we could build them? No. We would have at once declared it an invasion of the Monroe doctrine and proceeded to enforce that doctrine.

The Magdalena Bay bubble has burst. On April 6 there appeared in the daily press of this country a telegram from Tokyo, dated April 5, that the foreign office denied that Japan ever dreamed of procuring a foothold in America. The only basis for the alarm seems to be that a New England syndicate—that section of our country which is clamoring loudest for the battleships—has tried to unload a bad bargain upon a Japanese steamship company, not the Japanese Government. What contemptibly flimsy things are seized upon to get up a war scare, to influence Congress on the Navy program! In its issue of April 8 the Washington Post, which is strongly advocating two battleships at this session, in an editorial, is forced to admit that there is no ground for this Magdalena Bay nightmare, and says:

The ease with which the people of the United States are hoaxed as to Japan's designs belies the vaunted coolness of the Yankee in face of peril.

We should have the pose and deliberation of courage at least.

This editorial has a most significant suggestion when it further says:

But the tendency to show trepidation is not all on one side. The sentiment of fear and distrust is mutual. What we are going to do to Japan keeps the little brown man in a shiver.

Is it unreasonable for the Japanese to be suspicious of us? Is it unnatural that they should be irritated? Have we not for years, in some of our newspapers and in speeches on the floor of this House, been predicting war with them? Have we not impugned their motives and accused them of having designs upon us and of trying by intrigue to get a foothold in America?

Those who claim they desire a Navy for the purpose of securing peace are usually the ones who do the most talking about Japan. They could serve the interests of peace better by keeping cool heads and silent tongues. If they were deliberately planning to bring on war they could not pursue a more certain course. Nations, like individuals, soon tire of and become irritated by continual nagging, and soon turn to retaliatory measures. Let me warn them that a continuance in the course they have been pursuing is more likely to bring on a war than our failure to build battleships.

One of the arguments frequently used by the big Navy advocates is that the Monroe doctrine is no stronger than the Navy.

History completely refutes this contention. During the Civil War Louis Napoleon placed Maximilian upon the throne of Mexico and maintained him there by his army. After the close of the war in 1865 the United States, considering a foreign sovereign in Mexico, upheld by a foreign army, as an infraction of the Monroe doctrine, began to take steps to secure Maximilian's removal. We then had a large Army and a large Navy. Did we resort to them to defend that doctrine? No. We gradually disbanded our Army and naval forces, and Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, persistently pressed on Louis Napoleon the withdrawal of his troops, which he finally did in 1867. Pending these negotiations between Mr. Seward and Louis Napoleon, in 1866, Congress enacted a law reducing the Army to 54,000 men. The total number of ships of all classes in our Navy in December, 1864, was 671. After the close of the war the Navy was so reduced that in the fall of 1866 we had in commission only 115 ships of all classes. This reduction of Army and Navy was being carried on during our negotiations with Louis Napoleon for the removal of his army in support of Maximilian. What would the present critics of the Democratic caucus action have done had they been to the front then? To use a slang expression, they would have thrown one fit after another.

This doctrine has been several times threatened. We have never been compelled to use either our Navy or Army to prevent the infraction. We have always been able to accomplish it by diplomacy and arbitration.

It was threatened by England on the Venezuelan boundary-line issue. On December 3, 1895, President Cleveland, in his annual message, called attention to this controversy between England and Venezuela and what representations had been made by our Government to England looking to its settlement by arbitration. On December 17 he sent a special message to Congress giving the answer of England to these representations looking to a settlement by arbitration, and as the answer was not satisfactory he recommended that Congress authorize the appointment of a commission to determine the division line between England and Venezuela. This message created intense excitement throughout Europe as well as in America. In December Congress passed a bill authorizing the commission. In all this we were vigorously asserting the Monroe doctrine.

On January 1, 1896, the President appointed the commissioners, composed of eminent Americans and jurists. This commission invited the two Governments to formulate and present to it their respective claims and contentions. This invitation was complied with by both Governments. The commission proceeded with the collection of evidence until February 27, 1897, when the two Governments signed a treaty providing for the submission of the matter to arbitration. This arbitration tribunal was appointed and the controversy was settled by it. Thus England acquiesced in the Monroe doctrine and its integrity was maintained by firm but peaceful methods.

One of the most notable cases involving the doctrine was in the latter part of 1902 and the first part of 1903, when the Venezuelan ports were blockaded by the allied powers—England, Germany, and Italy—to enforce the collection of certain claims held by citizens of their respective Governments against Venezuela. In this controversy the position taken by President Roosevelt was that the Monroe doctrine was not intended to protect American States from the fulfillment of their legal obligations; therefore he made no objection to the occupation and bombardment of the port, but it was understood that the United States would under no circumstances permit the occupation of the interior territory even for a short time. On February 13, 1903, the allied powers and Venezuela signed protocols, under which Venezuela was to pay a small sum and submit the bulk of the claims to arbitration, and the blockade was raised. The question was afterwards settled by arbitration.

Thus in the only case in which the doctrine was violated—the case of France in Mexico—and the two most notable cases of threatened violation mentioned by me above, to wit, by England in the Venezuela boundary question and by England, Germany, and Italy combined in the case of collection of debts from Venezuela, we have maintained it in the case of actual violation and prevented its violation when threatened by diplomacy, negotiations, and arbitration.

At the time Louis Napoleon yielded, in 1867, we had comparatively no Navy or Army, and when we were involved over the doctrine with England and with the allied powers of England, Germany, and Italy our Navy was far inferior to theirs. So the contention by some that we succeeded by peaceful methods because we had the power to enforce our demands is absolutely untrue.

It is asserted that we have so much coast line it is necessary to have a large Navy to defend it. Did we not have the same coast line from 1820 to 1860, and from 1870 to 1890? During those years we had comparatively no Navy.

It is also contended that we need it to defend our over-sea commerce. Unfortunately for this contention the fact is that when our mercantile fleet was at its maximum our Navy was at its minimum.

To fully appreciate the wisdom of the action of the Democratic caucus in deciding to temporarily suspend the building of battleships until other necessary units of an efficient Navy can be supplied, you must bear in mind that we have not the money available at this time to build more battleships, and also supply a reasonable number of the smaller craft, which are as necessary as the large fighting ships.

The Secretary of the Navy in his last annual report says:

Destroyers in proper number (4 to 1) are absolutely necessary for the protection of the battle fleet against torpedo attack (p. 38).

Admiral Lord Charles Beresford, retired, one of England's greatest naval experts, says:

No guns, heavy or light, will protect a battle fleet from torpedo attack at night. The only effective method of protection is to employ a large number of small cruisers to clear a wide area about the battle fleet at sundown.

The small cruiser force must be disposed so that they form a protective screen distant 120 to 140 miles on all sides from the battle squadron. By no other means is it possible to move a battle squadron at night without risking its destruction by the attack of torpedo craft. No antitorpedo armament can effectually protect a fleet of battleships attacked at night by torpedo craft.

And in further support of my contention that we have been guilty of almost criminal negligence in expending all the available money upon battleships, thereby rendering it impossible to supply our fleet with the necessary torpedo craft, I quote from Rear Admiral Bacon, the director of naval ordnance of Great Britain. He says:

The enemies of the battleship have multiplied and include every vessel carrying a torpedo, such as cruisers, destroyers, submarines, and under certain conditions mine layers. In fact, the introduction of the torpedo has brought about a very considerable limitation in the powers of the battleship. Not only is the battleship itself open to attack by small craft which it can not engage on equal terms, but it is powerless to protect any form of vessel against the attack of such craft.

Rear Admiral Osterhaus, commander in chief of our Atlantic fleet, recently, in discussing the winter maneuvers of that fleet, says:

While British talk of effective torpedo exercise at 10,000 yards has not been confirmed, the accomplishment of this range is probable within the next few years. This means that the torpedo fire will be effective far beyond the distance at which searchlights can pick up torpedo craft. The fleet accordingly must depend on its torpedo destroyers forming a screen to engage the attacking torpedo fleet and prevent its coming within torpedo range.

And in further proof of the great danger to which a battleship fleet is exposed as against torpedo craft, I refer to the mimic war on July 19, 1911, in Block Island Sound, between the battleship fleet of 17 ships under command of Rear Admiral Hugo Osterhaus and a fleet of destroyers and submarines, in which the submarines and destroyers theoretically destroyed the whole battleship fleet.

In further support of what I have said in regard to the importance of our supplying the needed auxiliaries before building more battleships, I will read a telegram from London of date Saturday, March 6, and which appeared in the New York Herald of Sunday, March 7, 1912, which is as follows:

The board of admiralty is at present paying a great deal of attention to the improvement of the smaller units of the British fleet, the submarine and torpedo-boat destroyers, vessels which many experts believe would be of greater use in case of war than even the big modern battleships and battleship cruisers.

It is admitted by all naval experts that there are needed for each battleship 4 destroyers or submarines, which are torpedo craft. These are to be thrown out around and distant from the battle fleet, to protect it against surprise attacks of the torpedo craft of the enemy—a cordon of protection—both offensive and defensive.

No general of sufficient ability to command an army would think of lying in front of the enemy without throwing out his picket lines as a precaution against a surprise attack. Is not the Navy entitled to the same protection?

So far as I have seen, the Secretary of the Navy has made no excuse for not asking for these, further than to say that they can be built in a shorter time than battleships or obtained by purchase in case of necessity. I ask him where he could purchase 8 battleship cruisers, or 18 scout ships, or 82 torpedo-boat destroyers, or 6 tenders to destroyers, or 3 repair ships, or 5 supply ships, or 3 hospital ships, or 4 ammunition ships, or 22 submarines, or 10 tenders to submarines? All of these he states in his last report are needed for our present battleships. I also ask him if it will not take about two years to construct any one of these auxiliary vessels?

All through his last report the Secretary admits the necessity for all these, but it is evident that he fails to recommend anything but 2 battleships and 2 colliers, because he fears it will jeopardize the chance of securing the 2 battleships.

The whole Navy and Navy Department are hypnotized on the subject of battleships, and to secure these they are willing to sacrifice everything else needed.

Mr. Henry Reuterdahl, who is an expert and critic of such ability as to entitle his criticisms to grave consideration, in an article in Collier's of November 18, 1911, just after the naval display in Hudson River, says:

What if I tell you that should this fleet—the one assembled at the display—go to war to-morrow, the biggest part of it might be crippled, perhaps sunk, before it got very far. It might be torpedoed by the enemies destroyers even before it had met its main force.

Why? Because we have not sufficient destroyers or submarines to protect them against such torpedo attacks. He further says:

The destroyer is the battleship's worst enemy; on a stormy or foggy night searchlights do not protect the battleship, so a swarm of destroyers may easily get the big fellow at their mercy. A fleet can only be protected against torpedo attack by its own destroyers, which in daytime scout and search and at night maintain a screen against the onslaught of the enemy's craft. Each of the great navies has a large number of these eyes of the fleet, but not the United States.

How criminal to send these battleships out, to be preys to torpedoes, without the necessary protection!

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. GREGG of Texas. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it necessary to protect our battleships when they go out?

Mr. GREGG of Texas. Yes, sir; it is absolutely necessary. Right in that connection I should say if war should break out to-morrow we would have to hide our battleships under the shore defenses of this country. We could not go out with them. We could not use them without running the greatest risk.

He further says:

Naval battles are not fought in harbors, but far out at sea. Before they meet the enemy our vessels may have to cruise thousands of miles. They will need coal. For want of a sufficient number of colliers this great American fleet of ours is tied to its coal piles. What about repair and ammunition ships? Suppose in its first action the fleet's supply of powder and shell is exhausted; it must run to base.

What a pitiable spectacle!

Secretary Meyer, in his last report, says:

Destroyers in proper number are absolutely necessary for the protection of the battle fleet against torpedo attack.

He further says that we are 82 short of these absolutely necessary protectors of the battleships we have. Yet he recommends none of these in his building program for this year, and our critics insist we are unfriendly to the Navy because we want to supply some of them to protect the battleships we have before building more.

Commander E. W. Eberle, commanding our Atlantic torpedo fleet, says:

Four destroyers to a battleship is the proper proportion in a well-balanced fleet, in order that there may be always an efficient, elastic, and cooperative scouting, screening, and offensive torpedo force with the main fleet.

According to him a properly protected fleet requires 4 destroyers to every battleship. We have 33 battleships and 50 instead of 132 destroyers. Still they say our Navy is not topheavy.

Suppose our 33 battleships had no armor-plate protection, what would you think of the sanity of a man who would advocate building more which would be equally unprotected instead of providing armor-plate protection for those we have? Protection by torpedo craft is almost, if not altogether, as essential as armor-plate protection. Secretary Meyer, in his last annual report, says that this protection is absolutely necessary.

Mr. HOBSON. Is the gentleman yielding to questions now?

Mr. GREGG of Texas. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of a program of building torpedo-boat destroyers? I want to say I am in thorough accord with him in dealing, as he has so ably, upon the need and necessity for these destroyers; but I find—and I will not take his time—that those who are opposing battleships will not vote for the destroyers when the time comes.

Mr. GREGG of Texas. I was speaking of the necessity for this torpedo-craft protection. I am willing to supply them as fast as we can.

It will cost $103,331,400 to provide this torpedo-craft protection for the 33 battleships we have and the 4 we are building. The annual pay of the Navy and cost of administration is $101,000,000, so the Navy bill each year must carry that sum to start with. If we should undertake to supply in one year the torpedo-craft protection necessary, the bill would carry $204,331,400. If we undertook to do it in two years the bill would carry $152,665,700. If we undertook to do it in three years the bill would carry $135,443,800. This would be without any new battleships or any other new construction. Do you not think the taxpayers will be staggered when they see where we are going?

Commander Eberle says:

Submarines may well be termed the pirates of the sea, for they are peculiarly offensive weapons. I firmly believe that the submarine is to-day the most vital force in naval warfare and will prove a vital force toward the peace of maritime nations.

According to Secretary Meyer we are short 22 of the requisite number of submarines. Still, in the naval program for this year we are not asked to provide for any of these—most vital forces in naval warfare, and vital forces toward the peace of the maritime nations.

Everything is subordinated to two battleships. The policy is let everything else go. Just so we get the Dreadnoughts and super-Dreadnoughts—it makes no difference whether we have officers to command or men to man them or coal to make them go or destroyers or submarines to prevent them from being mere targets for our enemies' torpedoes.

Admiral Lord Charles Beresford, retired, of the British Navy, says that the British fleet is like an army which is all heavy artillery; that the Dreadnought policy was introduced to the public by means of an organized system of advertising in the press. He further says:

The public were and are hypnotized by the Dreadnought policy. The excessive and vulgar advertisements lavished upon this experimental vessel were by no means justified. To the building of these great ships has been sacrificed every other naval requirement. Without an adequate provision of these essentials—the battle fleet is useless for fighting purposes, and the money spent on it is a present to the future enemy.

The British Navy is much better supplied with auxiliaries than is ours, but he says that the failure of the British admiralty to supply more is a betrayal of the people. If this criticism can be made of their conduct, how much more blamable are those who are responsible for our much greater deficiencies.

Another reason why I think it wise to temporarily suspend the construction of battleships and proceed to supply some of the deficiencies as to auxiliaries is that the battleship is now in an experimental stage and naval construction is in a state of evolution and there may be in the near future such a change in such construction as to render obsolete and useless the present Dreadnought.

Admiral Lord Charles Beresford, in the extract which I have read from his book entitled "The Betrayal," says that the Dreadnought is an experimental vessel.

Germany now has on the stocks a ship which is to be equipped with internal-combustion engines, and it is said that the use of such engines will render obsolete all our battleships. We are told that these engines are only experimental. Concede it, but Germany will soon launch its ship and then the practicability of the engine will be demonstrated.

If it is shown to be serviceable, we will then be compelled to practically abandon what we have built and begin to build with those engines. If it proves unworkable, we will only have lost a little time.

What battleships are authorized at this session will be built on the super-Dreadnought style, probably larger than any we now have. Already that style is being severely criticized, and able naval constructors are advocating returning to ships of smaller size and greatly reduced unit cost.

On November 16 last the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers held its annual meeting in New York. At this meeting Sir William White, formerly chief constructor of the British Navy and who is an honorary member of that society, said:

My personal conviction, built upon long-continued study of the problem, is that the wiser course in warship building could be found in a return to more moderate dimension and a reduced unit cost for capital ships.

Experience has established the fact that without having resort to the extreme dimensions which have recently found favor it is possible to produce capital ships, which shall be powerfully armed, well protected, steady gun platforms, capable of fighting their guns in all weather when actions could take place, and able to retain their speed in rough water.

Rear Admiral A. T. Mahan, of the United States Navy, in a Navy paper written a few years ago, and which was made a Senate document, says:

Our present condition is that of abandoning all attempt at a guiding conception of types or standards, except the crude one that each ship must be larger than the last. The ultimate tendency of this, of course, will be to make ships after too short a time unequal to a place in the line. The moral effect is still worse, for it is inducing in the Navy, as in the public, a simple trust in bigness, and, what is worse, an absence of trust in anything but bigness.

In an article published in the Cosmopolitan in December, 1909, Sir Edward Seymour, an admiral in the British Navy, warned the naval authorities of the world against building ever-increasing larger types of battleships. He said:

Another reason that should seriously interfere with construction of larger ships than we now have is the limitation of harbors. There are in the whole world only a few harbors in which a great battleship can anchor with ease.

Another limitation on the size of battleships is the navigable width of the Suez Canal and Panama Canal. The width of the Suez Canal locks is 108 feet. The width of the Panama Canal locks is 110 feet.

The rule of safe and commodious navigation is that on both sides of a vessel there shall be a leeway of 5 feet. The Oklahoma, New York, and Texas have a breadth on load water line of 95 feet 2½ inches. Neither of these vessels could pass through the Suez Canal with ease. They could pass through the Panama Canal probably expeditiously and safely. If, however, a super-Dreadnought of 31,000 tons displacement should be constructed and its width should bear the same proportion to its displacement as that of the others I have mentioned, it will have breadth on load water line of over 100 feet and could not be carried at all through the Suez nor through the Panama Canal safely.

Knowing that whatever battleships we may authorize at this session will be built on the present slow Dreadnought style, another very strong reason for temporarily suspending such construction is that a modern development in the British, German, and Japanese Navies is a vessel equal in size to the battleship, which carries the battery of the battleship, but some of its armor protection is sacrificed for greater speed.

There is a sharp controversy between naval experts as to whether the present type of slow Dreadnought or the fast cruiser with the same armament, but with much greater speed, is the most formidable. Let us not stop Navy construction, but delay for a breathing spell until this controversy is settled.

Rear Admiral Bacon, the director of naval ordnance of Great Britain, in speaking of the inefficiency of the present type of slow battleship, says:

This is probably best shown by the consideration that if a country possessing a battle fleet were fighting another country which did not possess a battle fleet, and as regards other classes of vessels the two countries were more or less on an equality, the value of the battle fleet would be so small compared to the risk of its loss that in all probability it would never be used during the war, and its possession would in no way increase the fighting power of that country during such war. In fact, in these days the battleship has developed merely into a vessel for fighting other battleships, and it shuns as far as possible encounters with most other classes of vessels.

By this he means that the nation with the slow battleship fleet would need its fast cruisers and torpedo craft to accompany and protect the battleships, and the speed of the whole would be limited by the speed of the battleships; therefore it could not force a battle with the enemy's fast cruisers and torpedo craft.

The enemy could choose its own time, place, and conditions for the fight; and the cruisers and torpedo craft with the battleships could not go out to attack the fleet of the enemy nor maneuver to protect themselves, but their maneuvers would be governed by consideration of protection of the battleships.

The British Naval and Military Record, published by Capt. J. A. Cuffe, which has been largely advertised in the German service journals and the substance of which was reproduced in The Navy, an American service journal, in the November, 1911, issue.

In this article, Capt. Cuffe lays great stress on speed, as it always gives the power of initiative. He says:

The superiority of artillery can not be effective without superior speed, as the speediest fleet can always keep out of range. The slower fleet is powerless.

The present program of two battleships a year is predicated on the presumption that two will become obsolete each year as the result of successive steps in the development of such ships. If this presumption is correct, there is something wrong, radically wrong, in naval construction. Rear Admiral Mahan, in the paper to which I have referred elsewhere, says:

This willful premature antiquating of good vessels is a growing and wanton evil. It is true, indeed, that this obsolescence is more in idea, in crude impression, than in fact.

It is said that the Oregon is obsolete. Why? Is it because of her speed? If so, why are those we are building given an increase of speed of only a little more than 20 per cent over hers? Why not give them an increase of 50 per cent, thereby delaying for a longer period their obsolescence on this account? Is it because her armor protection is deficient? Her armor is thicker than that on ships of later date. Is it because she carries only 13-inch guns? If so, the 14-inch guns on our latest ships will soon make them obsolete. Why not at once adopt guns with a range extending to the limit at which a ship can be seen? This would forever prevent the obsolescence of ships because of the guns.

The time has come for the investigation of this matter, with a view of finding out why ships that are apparently in perfect condition are antiquated, and of ascertaining whether they are in fact obsolete; and if so, of finding out the remedy. Pending this investigation no more should be authorized, because what we authorize will be constructed with the same defects and with the same idea of their becoming obsolete within a very short time.

It is claimed by some that because of the character of shells we are using, which employ such excessive powder charges, that the accuracy of the guns is destroyed by erosion in a little more than an hour of continuous firing. Those who make this claim contend that in other countries, by the use of a different shell, the guns are given a destructive range limited only by the distance at which a ship can be seen, and the gun is given a longer life and may be expected to last through a war of ordinary duration.

Now, had we not better wait long enough to make such tests as will demonstrate the correctness of this contention? If found to be correct, we will have to build differently from the manner in which we are now building, so as to use these shells to the best advantage.

But another reason which makes it proper and safe for us to suspend temporarily the construction of battleships, and which not only makes it proper and safe, but which makes it imperative, is that we have not the officers and men for those we have.

It has been recently announced that the armored cruisers North Carolina and Washington, both comparatively new, and all of the scout cruisers are to go into reserve, in order to be able to man the battleships nearing completion.

In the case of war we should have all the officers and men necessary. In this respect we are lamentably deficient. To man our present complement of ships on a peace basis we are short 350 officers and 4,000 men. To put our present number of ships on a war basis would require 1,424 officers and 18,000 men, in addition to the officers and men we have.

Owing to this great shortage we are compelled to keep out of commission or in reserve a large number of our ships. We might in time of war raise lubberly crews for these ships, but to put an untrained crew upon our fighting vessels to go out to meet in battle the trained crews of an enemy would be the height of folly.

If the officers and men are not thoroughly skilled and trained in their duties it would be far better to keep our ships under protection of our shore batteries, than to send them out to destruction or capture.

I think it high time that we should provide for the enlistment of men enough to man our present ships, and I would rather provide for that, than build more ships for which we will have no men. I would rather have 33 battleships fully equipped with competent officers and skilled crews and with the necessary torpedo craft protection and the necessary auxiliaries, than twice as many without them.

In the position I take, I do not feel that I am taking a backward step in our national defense. On the contrary, I feel that I am taking a forward step, and if I can aid in any way in calling a halt upon our present big-ship mania, until we can supply the officers, men, and auxiliaries absolutely necessary to make every ship a complete, efficient fighting unit, I will feel that I have done something for the good of the service as well as the good of the country.

My policy instead of being inimical to national defense is in the interest of such defense. I would have fighting ships completely equipped fighting units, and as expressed by some naval experts I would not have them sent out "little more than palatial, floating arsenals, affording targets for foreign-torpedo craft to destroy."

I am not opposed to reasonable battleship construction, when such construction does not go to the extent of making their number out of all proportion to the necessary auxiliaries to make them effective.

When we build I favor building the very best that can be constructed, the fastest and most deadly fighting ships, the fleetest destroyers, the best submarines, the best and most modern colliers, ammunition, supply and hospital ships. But I would not waste the public money in building Dreadnoughts which could not proceed far from base without ships to supply them with ammunition and coal and without sufficient torpedo craft, such as destroyers and submarines, to protect them.

I would, when each battleship is authorized, at the same time provide the necessary auxiliaries and also authorize the enlistment of enough men to man it when completed, thus we would build up a homogeneous, workable, efficient Navy, and every fighting ship would at short notice be ready to go out to meet the enemy fully manned, protected from torpedo attack, and supplied with fuel and ammunition. This is my idea of an ideal Navy, whether large or small. This is the kind of Navy I want us to have.

We can not at once supply all the men and the auxiliaries needed for the fighting ships we have, but I favor doing this as fast as we can and thereby relieve our present top-heavy condition.

The criticism from interested officials and service journals that we are abandoning preparation for our national defense is neither true nor just.

We favor, owing to the necessities of our Treasury, at this session building no battleships, but using the money available to build the adjuncts necessary to make what we have thoroughly efficient.

Not to build any this year does not mean that we abandon their building, it is only suspension for a short time that we may supply the other necessary naval units.

Instead of being enemies of the Navy we are its friends. We are trying to improve and correct the errors of the past. For the spectacular we would substitute the practical and efficient. Instead of sending out a $12,000,000 or $14,000,000 ship to be torpedoed and sunk we would send it out with a cordon of protection around it. Instead of sending out the 1,000 men and officers on it to an almost certain watery grave we would send them out with a chance for their lives and with the same chance for victory as the enemy would have. [Applause.]

Our critics have not dared to state fully or fairly our position in their effort to prejudice us before the public. They say the Dreadnought is the Navy, therefore build more of them at the expense of everything else. We say that even if more battleships are needed it is absolutely certain that we need torpedo craft to protect what we have, and the fast cruisers, tenders to destroyers and submarines, repair ships, and hospital ships to make effective the battle fleet we have, and that, as it will take $341,741,078 to supply them, and as there is not money enough to provide them and build more battleships now, we think it wiser, having in view an efficient Navy, to supply them and temporarily suspend the construction of battleships, particularly since this country is outstripping the world in the construction of huge Dreadnoughts. We now have six built and building that range from 26,000 tons displacement to 27,500 tons displacement. The largest British battleship building is of 25,000 tons displacement. We leave it to the sane judgment of the American people if we are not right.

The hidden but real purpose of our critics is to drive this Nation into the construction of such a Navy as will overawe the other nations for the purpose of world powering and dominating the seas.

We favor building a Navy for the defense of our coasts and protecting American citizens wherever their rights may be jeopardized.

They preach the doctrine of force; we preach the doctrine of arbitration. They would encourage and stimulate the mad rush of nations to greater military power and lay heavier burdens on the backs of the people, while we would welcome the day when nations "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, and neither shall they learn war any more." [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] if he will not use some of his time.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks upon the bill which is now before the House.

As the chairman of the committee stated in his remarks, this bill carries appropriations to the amount of $7,650,000, in round numbers, less than last year. So far as the bill is concerned, speaking generally, I am heartily in favor of it, and I desire to commend the new chairman of the committee for the able manner in which he has framed this bill, with the assistance, of course, of the members of the Naval Committee. I find nothing to criticize except when it comes to the naval program, and I shall confine my remarks on this occasion largely to a discussion of this naval program. The reason why this bill carries less money than the bill of a year ago is because we have a smaller program. The bill of a year ago authorized two battleships. In this bill there are no battleships authorized. It is the smallest, the weakest, the most uninspiring naval program submitted to the House of Representatives for a great many years. The committee distinctly raises the issue here whether we propose to maintain the efficiency of the American Navy or whether we propose to let it go down. That is the real question which is presented by this weak and insipid naval program. Last year we appropriated some $16,000,000 toward the naval program which we authorized, but this year we appropriate, because we do not need any more for this little naval program, $5,927,000, and that is the reason why the naval appropriation bill this year is so much smaller than it was last year.

What is the naval program this year? Two fuel ships, six torpedo-boat destroyers, and four submarine boats. What inspiration is that to my friend the gentleman from Alabama

[Mr. HOBSON]? I have been wonderfully amused this afternoon to see my friend from Texas [Mr. GREGG] justify the action of the Naval Committee, because I know at heart he is not in favor of the proposition for a weak naval program.

But he says we do not want to have it understood that the Democratic Party is opposed to the Navy. We would like to have it understood that this is merely a suspension for this year, and that in the future we propose to authorize battleships. And then he goes on and makes an argument in favor of auxiliaries for the Navy. He says we need to round out the Navy. Well, if the Committee on Naval Affairs, which is controlled by the Democratic majority, was in favor of auxiliaries this year, why did they not put some in the bill? All they put in were two fuel ships. If they thought we were short of them, why did they not increase them? Last year in our naval appropriation program we put in as many auxiliaries as they have this year.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. More.

Mr. FOSS. Yes, more, because there were some tugs that went in.

Now, my friend from Texas [Mr. GREGG] says we are short on torpedo destroyers and that we ought to have more of them. Then why do they not put in more this year? Last year we authorized eight, and this year you have only authorized six. If we are so short on these smaller craft, why do you not justify your position by authorizing a larger naval program in respect to these smaller boats?

The gentleman makes an attack upon the battleships, and says we ought not to appropriate for battleships or authorize them until we get a fixed, standard battleship. When every other nation has got that kind of a battleship, then he thinks we ought to build battleships of that kind. When we arrive at a fixed standard, then let us build battleships. What a ridiculous proposition! What we are trying to do is to get something that the other nation has not got; and so long as there is progress, so long as there is improvement, so long as there is invention in the world, and mankind is moving upward and onward, there will not be any fixed standard in the world. The standards will move as with the progress of mankind. And so it will be in the construction of navies and the construction of everything else. What was the trouble with our friends upon the other side? Why, the real trouble was that this whole question of a naval program was settled in a Democratic caucus, and the members on the committee, under pressure, would not vote their real opinions, but abided by the action of the caucus.

I know the sentiment upon that side, I think, to some extent. Last year between 30 and 40 Democratic Members voted for the naval program of two battleships. I wonder whether this year we will have as large a vote from that side when the proposition comes before this House, as it will come before this House, because I propose to offer an amendment for two battleships. I hope we will have as large a Democratic vote this year as we had two years ago, notwithstanding the action of the Democratic Party.

My friends, I regret more than anything else that our Democratic friends upon the other side saw fit to make the naval program subject to party action in a party caucus. In all the years that I have been a Member of this House I have never known a naval program to be taken into a Republican caucus and settled by party vote. Here we have thought that the Navy was out of politics; we tried to keep the Navy out of politics; and we have tried to keep politics out of the Navy, and yet you by your action have introduced politics in the formation of the naval program for this year. Our policy has always been that the Navy was nonpartisan. Parties might differ if they pleased about questions of tariff, monetary questions, financial questions, and all other questions relating to party policy, but when it came to the Navy, as Daniel Webster once said a great many years ago, "when it comes to the water's edge all politics cease." And that has been the policy ever since I have been in Congress. There has been no party action on the subject of the naval program, but every man upon that side, as upon this, has felt free to vote for one battleship, two battleships, three battleships, or four battleships, and yet you for the first time that I know of in history have made it party politics.

And why? Oh, to show economy, some one says. Well, that is not real economy. If you will introduce some reform in the administrative law by which thousands or millions of dollars shall be saved, that will be economy. But to strike down a naval program, to strike down the demand for public buildings, or river and harbor improvement, such as the country really needs, there is no economy in it, and the people will understand it so, even though you should do it in the face of a political campaign.

The battleship is recognized as the fighting ship of the Navy. A navy without battleships is of little good, and a naval program without a battleship upon it, without a fighting ship in it, has very little standing among the naval authorities.

Now, I propose to briefly discuss this matter from a party standpoint. Heretofore in all my discussions on naval affairs before this House I have treated the subject from a nonpartisan standpoint. But inasmuch as your action in party caucus gives me an excuse to do it, I propose to show here what party has been building up the American Navy after all.

I wish to say that we have had what might be called a naval policy in this country for a number of years. It began way back in 1883, in the administration of President Arthur, when Secretary Chandler was Secretary of the Navy, when we authorized the first ships of the new and modern Navy. Before that time during all the history of our country we never had really a naval policy. Whenever we had a war we would improvise a navy, and after the war was over we would allow it to go to pieces. That was so after the War of the Revolution, it was so after the War of 1812, and it was so after our great Civil War.

But in 1883, under Republican administration and under a Republican Secretary of the Navy, at a time when the distinguished father of the distinguished son [Mr. HARRIS] of Massachusetts was chairman of the Naval Committee, we started in on a policy of building up the American Navy, and we have been building it ever since. [Applause on the Republican side.] Since 1883 we have had 15 Congresses; 5 of them have been Democratic Congresses, or Congresses where the Democratic Party controlled in this House, and 10 of them where the Republican Party was in control.

During these years, from 1883, from the Forty-seventh Congress down to the Sixty-second Congress, we have been engaged in building up the American Navy, and Congress has authorized in that time 1,211,576 tons of ships of all kinds. During the 5 Democratic Congresses only 154,598 tons were authorized. But during the 10 Republican Congresses there were authorized 1,056,969 tons. That shows what proportion of the part the Democratic Congresses have played in the building up of the American Navy.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FOSS. I want to conclude this first. Every year we have passed appropriation bills, and I am not taking into consideration the deficiency bills, but simply the annual appropriation bills, and they have amounted to $1,670,000,000.

Comparative statement of the building of the new Navy under Republican and Democratic Congresses.

	Year.	Republican Congresses.		Democratic Congresses.

During the five Democratic Congresses the appropriations, all told, amounted to $214,000,000. In other words, under the Republican Congresses we have appropriated $1,450,000,000 for the maintenance and upbuilding of the American Navy since the time when we started in to build it in 1883. The fact of the matter is, notwithstanding the closing appeal of my friend from Texas [Mr. GREGG], urging us not for a moment to think that the Democratic Party is not really a true friend of the American Navy, that the Democratic Party has never been strong on the Navy. When their great leader, William Jennings Bryan, was a Member of this House he made his speech on the naval appropriation bill on July 9, 1892, and it can be found on page 5956 of the RECORD of the first session of the Fifty-second Congress. He made this declaration of his own opinion as to the size of a Navy:

Mr. Speaker, I believe in a sufficient Navy. We have it now, either in existence or in construction. We do not need more.

That is what he then said. At that time we had built and building 3 first-class battleships, a couple of second-class battleships, 1 armored cruiser, 13 protected cruisers, 3 unprotected cruisers, 8 gunboats, 2 torpedo boats, and 6 monitors. That was his idea of a sufficient Navy, and if we had carried out that idea, where would we have been in the Spanish-American War? It was a good thing that we went on and built up the American Navy when the Republican Party came into power in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman right there what the Republican Party appropriated in the Fifty-fourth Congress for the Navy. Was it not $29,000,000?

Mr. FOSS. It is right in the report of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Just the exact amount I do not know.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask if the condition of the Treasury would have afforded a very large appropriation at that time—1894?

Mr. FOSS. The condition of the Treasury has always been all right whenever the Republican Party has been in power.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; in 1893, when it issued bonds to fill it up.

Mr. FOSS. What is the gentleman talking about—the Cleveland bonds?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; the Harrison bonds.

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell us in this very interesting political view of the Navy——

Mr. FOSS. Oh, you have given it the political aspect.

Mr. CONNELL (continuing). Just what effect President Cleveland's Venezuelan message and the work of Secretary Whitney had to do with building up the American Navy, and making it ready for the Spanish-American War, when the Democrats came in after a Republican domination of years.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I will place in the RECORD, in connection with my speech, the naval program of each session of Congress from the time we built up the American Navy, and the gentleman will see just what the size of the Navy program was at that time—at Whitney's time—as well as the size of the naval programs immediately after and prior to the Spanish-American War.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. For a question.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Republican Party did make a campaign document of the naval accomplishments of the Republican Party, and did they not publish a speech of the gentleman who then was the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs as one of their campaign speeches, in the campaign book of the Republican Party, during the last campaign?

Mr. FOSS. I am not aware that they published any of my speeches.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, yes; both in the book of 1908 and the book of 1910.

Mr. FOSS. I admire their good judgment and taste. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. So do I.

Mr. FOSS. I never knew that any of my speeches were ever published either in one campaign book or the other.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then the gentleman is being informed by a very inexperienced Member.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, that has been the policy of the Republican Party during these years. We have built up the American Navy, and this is our record, and I want to say that our policy has been consistent.

In relation to battleships, as that is the principal issue here before the House, we have on the average for a great many years authorized two battleships every year. Go back over the last 16 years and you will find that we have authorized 31 or 32 battleships, an average of 2 ships a year. Our policy has been consistent, and when my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. GREGG] says that we have not had any fixed policy, it is because he has not been able to see it from his Democratic viewpoint. The policy has been there, however.

Of course we have also built other kinds of ships, 10 armored cruisers, a great many torpedo-boat destroyers, torpedo boats, and submarines, and our policy has been not only consistent, but it has been a moderate policy. We have never sought to rival England in our naval program or any other country on the face of the globe. England's naval program last year authorized five battleships. What its program will be this year it is a little too early to find out. Germany's program last year was three battleships. We have never sought to rival any of those great powers, but we have gone on in a consistent way, and I remember at one time when the President of the United States was very anxious for four battleships, yet the Committee on Naval Affairs reported against his wishes and authorized the regular number of two battleships. And during all this period, under pressure and not under pressure, the Naval Committee on the floor of this House has maintained a consistent and moderate policy of two battleships a year on an average. Now, we have not tried to rival the foreign powers in the size of it. England to-day, as this report shows, has a tonnage of fighting ships amounting to 2,324,000 tons. Germany comes second with 1,087,399 tons, and the United States third with 885,000 tons. This is based upon the ships built and in process of construction. On ships already built the United States just happens to stand second, but on ships authorized and building we stand third, and even if we should authorize two battleships this year, as I trust we may, our position will go down another point, and we will rank fourth among the nations of the world, and if we should authorize but one battleship this year and then for the next two or three years authorize two ships a year our position will go down to fifth, so that at the time of the opening up of the Panama Canal in 1915 we will rank fifth among the naval powers of the world, having gone from third place down to fifth.

Why, the wear and tear upon ships every year upon this 1,200,000 tons is at least 5 per cent, probably nearer 10 per cent, and if we authorize two battleships a year we would only simply be replenishing or providing for the wear and tear, and when we authorize no ships per year we are simply permitting our Navy to go down, to lose its efficiency, and lose its standard as a great national force of defense to our country. Therefore the issue comes to us this year as presented by our Democratic friends upon the other side not whether we propose to go on and build up a navy but whether we propose to keep it to its present state of efficiency. That is the issue and that is the question that will have to be met when the vote comes. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 35 minutes.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, a good deal of this discussion here this afternoon has related to peace. In times of peace I notice we all talk peace, but in times of war we all talk war. I have seen the sentiment in this House change from peace to war. It is very easy in these piping times of peace when no nation on the face of the globe seems to be bothering us, especially in this springtime when all nature is in love with herself and when we are in love with nature, when the birds are singing and the trees are flowering, when everything suggests peace, it is very easy and very pleasant to talk about peace, and we all wish for it, but I want to say to you here to-day that I do not believe that we have reached the period in the progress of mankind when we can say that all the days from now on will be peaceful, and there will be no war. We did not expect to go to war with Spain and yet war came very quickly, and, if I remember rightly, the peace dreamers were more anxious for war than others, and, if I remember correctly, after we got into war the peace dreamers were the men who criticized most vigorously the administration because we were not prepared and ready for it.

Human nature is the same the world over. We have got to change human nature before we will be able, I fear, to utterly abolish all strife and all war. Some people think that the peace conferences of the world will settle everything. I hope they may, and yet we have had two peace conferences, and I would not for one moment attempt to belittle the worth of those great conferences—the first peace conference of 1899 and the second peace conference of 1907. I think they have done great work. In the last peace conference 44 representatives from 57 of the world powers got together and discussed questions provoking war and questions relating to the conduct of war, and it was a great thing to bring together so many representatives from so many countries of the world simply for the purpose of discussing such subjects. These peace conferences have done a great deal toward ameliorating the conduct of war, making war, as it were, more humane, if it is possible to make cruel war humane, and these peace conferences have done a great work in establishing an international prize court. But the peace conferences have not yet abolished war. During the last 15 years every nation of any size on the face of the globe has been at war—Russia, Japan, England down in Africa, the French, Italy, Turkey, and the United States have been at war. Not only that, but the peace conferences have not yet been able to limit military expenses or to reduce armament. The first peace conference passed a resolution recommending the limitation of armaments and the decrease of military expenses, and the second peace conference also adopted the same resolution, but between the first peace conference and the second peace conference the nations of the world built more battleships than they ever did before, and between the second peace conference and the present time they have built even greater than they did between the first and the second peace conference.

So when you come to measure and discuss the question as to whether peace conferences will be able to do away with all wars, it is wise enough for us to consider what they have already been able to do up to date. A great many arbitration treaties have been made between different countries of the world. But no country of any importance yet has been willing to submit in an arbitration treaty all questions affecting its national life. They have always excluded and excepted those relating to independence, to vital interests, to national honor, and domestic policy. It is easy enough to make a difference of opinion a matter of national honor. While it has been proposed to establish a court of arbitral justice, yet, nevertheless, it has been impossible to determine the personnel of that court. The success or failure of arbitration depends fundamentally upon one thing, and that is the confidence of the parties in the arbitrators. The nations of the world have not been able to agree upon the arbitrators—upon the personnel of the court. Is there any question which has provoked war into the United States in all our wars which we as a Nation would have been willing to have left to a court of arbitration, the majority of whose members would necessarily have been representatives of the monarchical powers of the world? Would we have left the questions which provoked the war of the American Revolution to a court, or would we have left the questions which provoked war with England in 1812 to a court of arbitration? Or would we have left the question which caused the great Civil War to a court of arbitration, a majority of whose members, as I said a moment ago, would necessarily be representatives of monarchical countries?

And so it is no wonder that nations stop, and hesitate, and wait, and reflect upon this great question as to whether we will submit our differences, questions of honor, of vital interests, of independence, to a court of arbitral justice.

My friends, a navy does cost something. In time of peace, when we do not need it, it seems a great luxury; but in time of war it is an indispensable necessity, and when war comes we must have it. Every ship must be ready and every man at the gun. There is no time then to build ships and no time to train men, but we must have a navy ready and prepared for action to defend the interests of our country whenever those interests are assailed. It costs a good deal to maintain it—we will say $125,000,000, a large sum of money—but after all, the cost of preparation would be but a very small percentage of the cost by lack of preparation, if by that lack of preparation we were defeated in time of war. One hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars with our population of 90,000,000 is $1.50 per capita. When you come to compare it with our foreign commerce, which has been increasing with leaps and bounds, it is only a small percentage. When you come to compare it with our great national wealth, which to-day amounts to $120,000,000,000, it is only about one-tenth of 1 per cent—the cheapest insurance on the face of the globe. [Applause.]

Now, I say to you that it is a part of our national duty to maintain a strong and efficient navy to protect our interests. We have great interests to protect. If we have any navy at all, we want a good one, and we want battleships in the naval program. A small or a weak navy is of no use whatever; but we want a strong and efficient navy for the protection of our interests, which are many, upon this hemisphere and also upon the other. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] a short time ago spoke about the Monroe doctrine and said it had not been settled by an appeal to arms. In the instances to which he referred in the history of this country he referred to the attempt of Napoleon the Third to set up a government upon this hemisphere; but he failed to remember that our Army at the close of the Civil War marched down to the Rio Grande, and soon after that Maximilian left. Then he spoke of the time of our disagreement with Great Britain, when the dispute was over Venezuela, and there was no appeal to arms.

It is true there was no appeal to arms, and there never, in my judgment, will be another contest between Great Britain and this country. So long as Canada is situated on the north she will always be the hostage of peace. But, my friends, while the Monroe doctrine may not have been assailed very often in the 100 years that have passed, my candid judgment is that in the 100 years to come it will often be appealed to.

We are constructing a great Panama Canal, which is soon to be completed. That Panama Canal will be the great commercial thoroughfare for the nations of the world, and a part of the sea which heretofore has been isolated will be covered with merchant ships of the world. The Caribbean Sea will be another Mediterranean, and my judgment is that by reason of these things the Monroe doctrine will oftener be called into question in the years to come than it has been in the years that have passed. In this connection I would like to read to you just a word from our great naval authority, Capt. Mahan, upon this subject. Says he:

> The chief political result of the Isthmian Canal will be to bring our Pacific coast nearer, not only to our Atlantic seaboard, but also to the great navies of Europe. Therefore, while the commercial gain through an uninterrupted water carriage will be large, and is clearly indicated by the acrimony with which a leading journal, apparently in the interest of the great transcontinental roads, has lately maintained the singular assertion that water transit is obsolete as compared with land carriage, it is still true that the canal will present an element of much weakness from the military point of view. Except to those optimists whose robust faith in the regeneration of human nature rejects war as an impossible contingency, this consideration must occasion serious thought concerning the policy to be adopted by the United States.

And, then, further he says:

> If the decision of the Nation, following one school of thought, is that the weaker we are the more likely we are to have our way, there is little to be said. Drifting is perhaps as good a mode as another to reach that desirable goal. If, on the other hand, we determine that our interest and dignity require that our rights shall depend upon the will of no other State—

And, mind you, under our treaty we are obliged to guarantee the neutrality of the Panama Canal—

> but upon our power to enforce them, we must gird ourselves to admit that freedom of interoceanic transit depends upon predominance in a maritime region—the Caribbean Sea—through which pass all the approaches to the Isthmus. Control of a maritime region is insured primarily by a navy; secondarily, by positions, suitably chosen and spaced one from the other, upon which as bases the navy rests and from which it can exert its strength.

And so I might read from another authority which I have here on the subject—Homer Lea, in his interesting book, The Valor of Ignorance:

> With the exception of the Monroe doctrine no undertaking since the formation of this Republic is more fraught with possibilities of warfare or calls for greater military and naval expansion than the building of the Panama Canal. Unless the United States is willing to increase the military and naval strength proportionate to the dangers that at once become existent with its completion, it is a mistake to proceed with its construction.

Let me quote again briefly from the same writer:

> The eventual control of the Panama Canal is foretold by the history of the Suez, which, diminishing the distance between Europe and the Orient to one-half, became the main channel of communication between the West and the East. Built by France, it soon passed into English possession. The control of the Suez by England resulted from her masterful position in the Mediterranean and the Red Sea—the strategic possessions of Gibraltar, Malta, Egypt, and Aden. That France built the canal determined in no way its final ownership. The possessions of Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Egypt, and Aden, together with a navy maintained on a basis of being equal to the navies of any possible coalition, determined to whom, in time of war, the canal would belong. Great Britain not only controls by means of it the oriental trade, but dominates the political relationship that Europe bears to Asia. What has brought about English commercial supremacy throughout the world has been, not alone the supremacy of the English Navy, but the possession of strategic bases. The existence of a great navy is entirely dependent on the ownership of strategic positions in different quarters of the globe and maintained by force.
> The Panama Canal is as important to the world as the Suez and not less so to European nations than to the American Republics. The control of it is as vital to the nation that desires to command the commercial as well as political destiny of the eastern Pacific as the Suez is to England in the control of Asiatic hegemony.

So there are two things which, to my mind, in connection with the building of the Panama Canal make it essentially necessary that we should maintain the efficiency of the American Navy: First, the bringing of this great isolated sea, as it were, into the commercial mart of the world, with the liability of differences of opinions, of altercations, of disputes of one kind and another, among the nations of the world; and, secondly, as I understand it, under our treaty we must guarantee the neutrality of the Panama Canal. Now, if we are to do that we must have a force, necessarily, to do it. So, to my mind, these great interests of our country demand the continuance of the policy of building up the American Navy.

We are an isolated country no longer. We have our possessions upon the seas—Hawaii and the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico and Guam—and it is necessary, if we are to protect these and hold them as our own, that we should continue the policy of building up the American Navy. I trust that when we come to vote on this question of two battleships, which has been the policy of the last 16 years, reported by the Naval Committee under Republican administrations, our Democratic friends upon the other side will raise the flag of country higher than the banner of party and vote for the efficiency of the American Navy and the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] will use some more time. Does the gentleman desire to use some more of his time at this moment?

Mr. FOSS. I will yield, if the gentleman desires me to, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS]. I will yield half an hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I should not have intruded myself on this debate but for a suggestion made to me, that possibly I, one of the new Members of the House, could join memories with the oldest Member of the House and say a word upon the matters which led to the formation of the national policy of naval defense.

I am looking back now for a few moments to a period 36 years ago, when my late honored father came to this House as a Member from Massachusetts, from the district which I now represent. He came in the Forty-third Congress, and in the Forty-fourth Congress, as I recall the number, he was given a place on the Committee on Naval Affairs. At that time the question of rehabilitation of the Navy was beginning to be agitated by some people. Talk of more war was not pleasing to the ears of a people who were anxious to reengage in the industries of peace rather than the arts and stratagems of war; but there were those who were able to look through the fog of uncertainty and doubt and see that this country was to be in the future a great, united, and powerful people, and that it must have adequate instrumentalities of defense, and, if necessary, of offense.

Singularly enough at that period, as in this one, it was a time of investigation rather than of construction. For six years a member of that committee, he and those who believed as he did labored hard upon the work of rehabilitation of a Navy, or rather the creation of a Navy, because after the Civil War we had no Navy worthy of the name. The nations of the earth had taken lessons from some of the incidents of that war, and the Monitor had been a monitor to all the world that if there were to be navies there must be new navies, and all the foreign powers started upon the construction of entirely new navies.

In those days Members of Congress did not have comfortable offices or personal clerks, and most of them then, as many of them now, could not afford to pay for a large force out of their own pockets. It happened that I was a young man in college, and for a while just before and after I graduated I was able to spend some time here and help my father in his clerical work. I had occasion to write and rewrite a list of the old ships and their armament so many times that I could do it in the dark, almost, and I saw the men who came here and I heard the arguments pro and con upon the question of a navy. The country at that time had not arrived at the period of the resumption of specie payments, but was discussing it with great earnestness and dread. The old officers of the Navy were still wedded to wooden ships. The era of seel or iron shipbuilding had only just begun. The nations of the earth were afraid of the great steam vessel, with its consumption of coal. The problems before that committee were, What shall be built and what shall be done? Finally, in the Forty-seventh Congress, my father was made chairman of that committee, and after his six years of labor he commenced upon the policy of building a new steel navy. The questions of steel versus wood, sails versus steam, sails with auxiliary steam, ram construction, torpedo equipment, and all those things had been worked through for a period of six years. In 1883 the committee finally drafted a bill and reported it to this House calling for the construction of two steam steel vessels. Old Admiral Porter, who had been much interested in it, was at first averse to steel. He then became converted to it, but said its cost was prohibitive. The steel makers of this country, that industry being then in its beginning, were invited to come here to Washington and say how much steel they could make, what sort of steel they could make, at what price they could produce it, and all those things pertaining to the steel industry.

In the old Naval Committee room, which is now the room of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the senior Member of this House, I have seen all the steel makers and shipbuilders of that day—the Cramps, old John Roach, the Hunts, representatives of the Norway Iron Works, of the Thomson Steel Works, and others—with specimens of flange steel and angle steel and all the things that they brought here, until the committee room looked like a boiler shop. Finally, in the closing days of that session, Admiral Porter, convinced of the wisdom of the new Navy and of the practicability and possibility of steel construction, went before the Appropriations Committee of this House, indorsed the new policy and the Republican program, and advised the passage of that bill.

Two ships were laid down, the Boston and the Chicago. The keel of the Boston was laid first. The Chicago was finished first. Now, what changes came between that time and the first time that the battleship Chicago ever had to engage in a contest? Begun in 1883, she never was in a battle until 1898. She had been outbuilt and outclassed in pursuance of the national policy adopted in 1883; and yet 15 years after the adoption of that policy she was with Dewey in Manila Bay, useful and efficient, and on a single day in her existence justified the expense and the national policy which had been adopted and which had then steadily been followed and has been since, from that day to this. [Applause.]

There are some things in my mind and heart that are lessons to me. On the day when the news came over the wires to the little village in which I lived that Dewey had been into Manila Bay and had done well the task that he was sent to do, I walked across my lawn to the house of my aged father, then grown old and feeble, and I read to him the news that came to me, and that aged man made no reply but this. He looked at me and said:

Well, boy, it looks as if eight years of hard work had at last been of some use to my country.

[Applause.]

But it was 23 years from the time when he commenced the work until the day that proved its value.

Can we afford to abandon a policy of preparedness? Why, the gentleman from Texas says we must wait until all the world experiments and finds the standard vessel and then build. If we had not built in 1883, we would not have been ready in 1898, and we know that in 1898, prepared as we were, we were yet scared to death to know where the Spanish fleet was going to turn up and whether we were ready for it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Scared in Boston as well as Savannah.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; Boston and Savannah both scared to death. Now, in the active lifetime of the oldest Member of this House, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, what things have come to pass? He is perennially young, but he has to admit that his years are more than those of some others. He has seen men who were young officers in the Civil War, who met the encounter and shock of war, grow to fame and then retire. Some are still with us, some of them have traveled the road that we all must travel. Dewey, Sigsbee, Sampson, Schley, and Evans, all those men were young officers in my father's time, and were all for the steel naval program, and all in consultation with him, and much of the correspondence of that day is now preserved by me with great respect and honor in my library at home. They had an equipment which was of that time, and splendidly they met their duties. They could not have done it if they had not had the means and instruments to meet and overcome the enemy. But it took time to build, to maintain, to equip, and the policy has been interfered with seldom.

My friend from Georgia asked a question about Secretary Whitney, who undertook to get his models from abroad at one time. He sent to England for the model of the Texas, and when he got her over here and built she would hardly stand upright until the American naval architect went to work and fixed her over, and then she proved to be a good ship at Santiago.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is mistaken; I did not ask any such question.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well, it was some other Member. I have seen the day of experiment. We are always experimenting and have always got to. We first built the Ammen ram, which had a great steel prow with which we calculated to run the enemy down. But when we got the ram done we could not get her out of her own way. After that we had a torpedo boat Alarm, with wings on each side, and she was going to get opposite the enemy, run a bar underneath her, put torpedoes under her, and blow her up. I went down on the Chesapeake to see the operation of the torpedo, and I never got such a ducking in my life as I did when a torpedo went off. We have erected torpedo stations and all sorts of things, all in the process of experiment and evolution, and no one ship has been built that has not been an improvement on the other—it always must be so—until to-day we not only have a splendid fleet of ships, not large enough, but we have taught some lessons to others, and there are some lessons that we have learned from them.

To-day we are talking about a greater traffic on the great ocean. To-day we have warships carrying the names of inland as well as seaboard States, advertising the extent of the territory and the greatness of this country, and we hope to pave the way to put onto the ocean where they go a traffic which shall be that of commerce and leading to a world-wide peace. [Applause.]

Why not protect it? We talk about the expense. Gentlemen, when we first commenced to use kerosene oil we had the little flat-wick lamp, that would hold perhaps, a pint of oil and burn for three or four evenings. Then we got the big round-wick central-draft lamp, that would burn a quart or two of oil in an evening. Folks said they were too expensive to use, but by and by we all woke up to the fact that it was not oil we were after, but light. Any man who wants to may use the old lamp, but he wants electric light now. He wants light, and in this development of our Navy we can remain in the semiobscurity, or complete obscurity, of the old sailing ship, or we can come out in the broad light of the modern battleship, which gives us that which we want—safety and insurance for safety.

To-day we have upon our battleships men from the North and the South and the East and the West, from every section of this great united country; young men, to be officers, ultimately commanders, perhaps; men who will officer, command, and sail those ships. Do we want them to go out into the ocean and possibly into contest, if unhappily it shall come, without the equipment of their day and time, as Dewey and Schley and Sampson had the equipment of their time, doubtful of it as we were? I think not. Those men will vie with each other to prove their devotion to a beloved and united country. We have the men, and whether it is a case of ship to ship, or whether it is a case of desperate individual enterprise, like that of Cushing or of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] in the Merrimac incident at Santiago Harbor, we will have the men, and all we want for insurance of our safety is to give them the ships.

Let not this House be deterred from making proper appropriations from any mistaken notions of economy. Such appropriations are but the premiums upon the insurance of our national safety and honor. Without them we are in peril. We may meet with shame and ultimate humiliation. In my judgment, the people of this country in that department want nothing called or spelled economy, but which means peril and humiliation possibly, and any action of this House making appropriations insuring the honor and safety of this country, appropriations guided solely by the motive of securing those, will not meet with criticism, but with universal approval. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman understand that what is known as a naval program contemplates a maximum number of battleships?

Mr. HARRIS. What does the gentleman mean by maximum? I understand the naval program has been ever since 1883 to increase our strength all of the time, offsetting that which comes by mere outclassing or by becoming obsolete—building enough to meet depreciation and making always some advance. We have not undertaken to overtake or outstrip England or the countries that had the start of us, but we are trying to get somewhere near them and insure the national defense.

Mr. McKENZIE. The point I would like to have made clear in my mind is as to whether or not we are working to an end to have a Navy of a certain size, and that the policy is to build so many ships each year until we arrive at that maximum and then keep our Navy at that strength.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I can hardly answer what may be the policy of a Naval Committee which is charged with the duty of preparing the yearly budget, but I have stated in this way that I saw the shaping of a policy of creating and maintaining and increasing the Navy, and to-day, after 36 years, when that policy was commenced upon, I find myself, singularly enough, confronting the situation that my father did when we had a Congress opposed to the Navy. The policy was then adopted, and I do not want to see it abandoned. Just what the framework of it may be I can not tell, except to maintain and increase.

I yield back the balance of my time, and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHER].

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have carefully studied the bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, which is now under consideration, and on page 63 provision is made for the increase of the Navy. In that provision no allowances are made for battleships.

Mr. Chairman, I am here as a Representative in part of the great State of New York, and believe I am voicing the sentiment of a majority of the people of that State by advocating the building of battleships. The United States of America is considered to-day as a world power, and we must maintain that position. I have spoken to several people in reference to this question, and it is not my intention to adversely criticize their opinion, although I disagree with them. There are some who will argue that at this session we should dispense with the appropriation for battleships and increase our naval strength by building more fast cruisers, torpedo boats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and submarines. I believe smaller vessels are necessary to our Navy. However, recent wars have demonstrated that it was the battleships that did the fighting and settled the question of supremacy. I was surprised to learn that others take the position that this country has won great victories when we had no Navy to speak of. Mr. Chairman, that was almost a century and a half ago, and I am certain that if we had had a first-class Navy at that time there would have been no Valley Forge, and the sufferings of the patriots there would have no place in our history. The nations of the world are sparing no effort to increase their navies; in fact, they are going to the extreme limit of their treasuries in some cases.

From time to time we hear of The Hague peace meetings. There, if I am not misinformed, representative men from the various nations assemble for the purpose of devising some means to establish a world's peace. Their work is to be encouraged; their object is a laudable one; but we must not forget the fact that while they are holding out the olive branch of peace to each other their Governments at home are insisting upon the building of battleships. This state of affairs makes it imperative that the United States Government should continue to increase our Navy. No sane man wants war. We want peace. But it must be a peace with honor. With that thought in mind, let me read a few lines from Washington's Farewell Address to the American people. I read:

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it.

Mr. Chairman, this quotation from our first President's address can be applied to the present situation in this House. No doubt the principle of economy practiced by the majority party in this House will receive public approval, as they have demonstrated that there was room to curtail expenses in several departments of the Federal Government without interfering with their efficiency. Although I realize the necessity for economy at this time, I believe it would be unwise to extend it to the Navy Department. In discussing the question of economy it recalls to my mind an old but true saying, "Be careful lest you be a penny wise and a pound foolish." At this time I wish to read some figures relative to the warship tonnage and naval budgets of the principal foreign powers:

Relative order of warship tonnage.

In some cases, notably Germany and Japan, the above does not necessarily represent the actual expenditures. Money is undoubtedly transferred to the Navy from other appropriations and does not appear as naval expenditures.

The expenditures during the Russo-Japanese War are additional to the budgets given for these years for Russia and Japan, the amounts not being known.

There are some who say that my great interest in this question is caused by the fact that there is a Government navy yard in my home city. I am looking upon this question as one of national importance. It is not a local issue, nor a partisan one. I am not unmindful of the interest of the Brooklyn Navy Yard. If the question were where to build battleships, the Brooklyn Navy Yard would need no champion on the floor of this House, for they have clearly demonstrated their ability, skill, and facilities to build the very best battleships afloat; and at this time I wish to read into the RECORD an article from the Scientific American:

WARSHIP CONSTRUCTION AT OUR NAVY YARDS.

[From the Scientific American, Jan. 11, 1908.]

Popular fallacies die hard, especially when they are kept alive by persistent and interested misrepresentation. A notable instance of this is the statement so often made and too widely believed that it costs a great deal more and takes considerably longer to build a battleship at a Government navy yard than it does at a private shipyard. There was a time, it is true, when navy-yard ships were very costly and took an unconscionable time to complete; but that was over 20 years ago, when political control of navy yards was rampant and before a certain courageous young naval constructor, who later became Chief Constructor of the Navy, undertook the task of rescuing our navy yards from political control, reforming their many abuses, and putting them in first-class working shape. It was the regeneration of these yards which rendered it possible for them to take hold of the highest class of naval work and complete it in the same time and for only slightly more cost than the best of our private yards. This was clearly proved some years later in the construction of the large modern battleship, the Connecticut, at the New York Navy Yard, when the work was carried through so expeditiously that the private yard which had taken the contract for the sister ship had to extend itself to the utmost to keep pace with the Government-built ship. One of the main objects of giving work of new construction to the navy yards was to spur the private builders to greater activity, for up to that time it was a notorious fact that the Government contract work was treated as a kind of standby in the private yards, the first attention being given to orders for private firms. The record made by the Connecticut for rapid construction has acted as a most effective spur to the private yards, and our latest warships, in spite of their greater size, are being built in from 50 to 60 per cent of the time taken to build the earlier ships.

The agitation in favor of navy-built ships originated within the Navy itself, and its most effective advocate was the naval constructor above referred to, Mr. Francis T. Bowles, who subsequently left the Navy and is now the president of one of the great shipyards upon which the Government depends mainly for the construction of its new Navy. The most complete and convincing presentation of the arguments in favor of navy-built ships is that made by Mr. Bowles in the year 1900 before a congressional committee on naval affairs appointed to consider the question. Just now, when the question is again being agitated, it would be impossible to find a better brief for the case than this testimony of the former constructor.

In his evidence before the committee Mr. Bowles stated that the first advantage of building ships in navy yards is that it maintains the efficiency of the mechanical force and of the plant and shops.

"The reason that we have navy yards is to provide ourselves with the means of equipping and keeping our ships in good order for purposes of war; and, with that end in view and in the light of our recent experiences, it is essential that the organization of a mechanical force and the equipment should be kept in efficient condition.

"Now, if in these yards, which are essential to the object of the Navy, we should keep a vessel or two vessels building all the time, we would have a nucleus of a complete force, and it would be necessary, in order to do that work with a reasonable degree of economy, that our yards should be kept in good order.

"The fact that a vessel is building in a navy yard makes it possible to conduct the repair work of the fleet economically and rapidly, because if a vessel comes in for repairs, as soon as it is determined what it is necessary to do the force is available and every shop is in working order, and the chances are that there is a stock of material on hand of every kind that would be needed to make these repairs. The matter of having the material on hand is one of the most essential items in carrying work on rapidly.

"The third advantage is that the amount expended for repairs will be reduced by the fact of having shipbuilding in the yard. That may seem a curious thing, but it is perfectly true that if you have got enough to do to keep an efficient force at work there will be no tendency whatever to magnify repair work or even to devote attention to considering what improvements can be made in existing ships.

"The fourth advantage in carrying on new work in the navy yards is that it enables the Government to maintain a high standard of workmanship and design, by which the contractors can be made to conform to what is necessary under their contracts, and I consider this a great advantage.

"I will combine that with the fifth item on my list—that building ships in navy yards provides a training for those who must inspect the contract work. I maintain that a man is unfit to be a Government inspector, to tell the contractor how his work shall be done and what is acceptable and what is not acceptable, unless he has had that kind of work himself.

"The next advantage to the Government in doing the work is that no profit has to be made. The cost of inspection can also be saved. When a ship is built by contract the Government maintains a force of inspectors and draftsmen, who inspect the work in progress and make the projected plans. The cost of a trial trip is another item saved, for it is the custom to remunerate the contractor, either in his contract or fairly as an extra bill, for all the expenses of the trial trip."

Now, since the above telling arguments were presented—and they are just as valid to-day as when they were made—the question, as we have noted above, has been put to the test by the construction at Brooklyn of one of a pair of the largest battleships so far built for our Navy; and the question naturally arises, How far have the predictions of the former chief constructor been verified? In answer, it can be said that the Connecticut, in spite of the strenuous efforts of the private firm which was building the sister ship Louisiana, was completed within the same time as that ship and within two or three months' less time than called for by the contract. Because of the fact that hours are shorter and the pay somewhat higher in the Government yards, no claim was ever made that the Connecticut could be built as cheaply as the Louisiana. It was estimated that she would cost about 10 per cent more than the other ship. As a matter of fact, in the final summing of the costs it was found that she cost only 5 per cent more. The latest official report of the Navy Department gives the total cost of the two ships to September 30, 1907—the figures including the expense of alterations chargeable to original construction, and also of armor and permanent ordnance fittings—as follows: For the Connecticut, $6,367,308.22; for the Louisiana, $6,037,344.47.

The question may be raised as to whether as good a ship can be built at our navy yards as at private yards. Perhaps the most conclusive test of this point is to compare the actual cost of repairs on these two ships since their completion. Fortunately, the figures are available; for the same report gives the cost of such repairs for the Connecticut as $94,314.56, and for the Louisiana as $110,500.19, a difference of about 17 per cent in favor of the Connecticut. As a matter of fact, the comparison is more favorable than appears on the face, and this for the reason that the totals for the Connecticut include repairs made necessary by her having been run aground during the past summer, an accident which, of course, is in no sense chargeable to the work on the ship itself.

In regard to the 5 per cent increased cost of the Connecticut, it is but fair to draw attention to the fact that this being the first large battleship to be built at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, there are several items of cost charged to her which would not appear against any subsequent battleship built upon the same ways. These are expenses due to work of a preparatory kind; to the provision of special tools in the machine shops and special appliances in the yard, which, once built, will be available for subsequent ships.

Thus, the preparation of slip, cribbing, and scaffolding cost over $39,000 for the Connecticut, as against $12,000 for the Louisiana; so also the cost of preparing launching ways and launching the ship cost over 100 per cent more for the navy-yard ship. There would be no such difference in the cost of the next battleship to be built on these same launching ways. Again in the preparation of beds and erecting, the list shows a cost of $12,000 or about 100 per cent for the Connecticut. This item probably refers to the beds on which the engines were built; yet these beds are now a part of the permanent plant of the erecting shop, and indeed are now being used for building the engines for the collier Vestal. It would be possible to follow the comparison further if we had time, and show that if the cost of these preliminary preparations and of special tools and appliances were charged to the plant of the yard, to which they properly belong, the difference of 5 per cent between the Connecticut and the Louisiana would be not a little reduced.

TIME TAKEN TO BUILD OTHER SHIPS.

The official record of the building of the other 21 best-known ships in the Navy shows that not one of them was built in contract time. The Nebraska, built by Moran Bros., of Seattle, and the Georgia, built by the Bath Iron Works, of Bath, Me., were over three years longer building than the Connecticut.

The New Jersey, built by the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., at Fore River, Mass., and the Virginia, built by the Newport News Co., at Newport News, Va., were over two years longer building than the Connecticut, although the Connecticut is larger than any of these ships by 15 feet in length, and by 7½ inches in beam, 9 inches in draft, and the displacement 1,000 tons greater, the coal capacity being larger by 500 tons.

I am in favor of an appropriation for the building of battleships. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, Congress, on May 30, 1908, created what was known as the National Monetary Commission and charged it with the duty of inquiring into what changes are necessary or desirable in our monetary system and in the laws relating to banking and currency. This commission made its report last January, in which it recommended very radical changes. To its report it appends a proposed bill embodying these changes. I desire to call attention to some of the provisions of this bill. I approach this subject with considerable hesitation. I am aware that the recommendations have the approval of the entire commission, a commission made up of men for whom I have the highest respect and with whom I regret very much to differ, but I fear that the commission must have felt constrained to shape its proposed legislation so as to avoid the opposition of certain banking and financial interests, who are now strenuously supporting its recommendations by organizing bankers and business men to push this plan through Congress. They are very impatient of any criticism. Let me say, however, that if this plan can not stand criticism, it should not pass.

In brief, the plan is this: A corporation is to be formed with a capital stock of not less than $100,000,000, which is to be owned by the banks of the country in proportion to their capital stock. This corporation is to have 1 central office and 15 or more branch offices. It is to be invested with the usual powers of a bank; it may receive deposits, make loans, buy and sell bonds, notes, and bills of exchange, and is to have the exclusive power of issuing bank notes. In other words, the plan is to create a great central bank of issue like the European central banks. Instead of calling it a bank, as such an institution would be known in Europe and elsewhere, it is to be called the National Reserve Association. This name is not descriptive. No one can miss the fact that the overshadowing function of the bank is to issue currency. Pages of the plan are devoted to that feature, while it almost fails to mention bank reserves at all. Scant place is found for a line or two, just enough to say that deposits placed with this central bank may be counted as a part of the reserves of the bank making the deposit. The reading of the plan certainly never suggested the name. Was it not for fear that a central bank would be unpopular that the commission called its creation a National Reserve Association? If so, will not this lack of courage and candor do more to defeat the plan than a frank avowal of its real nature? The American public demands fair and frank treatment. It has no patience with any scheme, no matter how meritorious, that dreads the light of day. If a central bank is what we need, we ought not, however, allow prejudice to prevent us from securing one. In almost every European country there is a central bank. It is also true that there has been less danger of bank panics in those countries than has been the case with us; but it does not follow as a consequence that security against panics is due to the central banks or that it is necessary to establish one in this country. If banking in this country was carried on in as conservative a manner as in Europe, there would be but very little danger of panics. So long as banks permit their funds to be used in reckless speculation, and so long as law and public opinion will tolerate the issue of untold millions of fictitious or inflated stocks, bonds, and other securities, upon which bank credits rest, we shall have panics with or without a central bank. No banking system can save a bankrupt bank or prevent runs upon it.

Should we create this proposed central bank we must not deceive ourselves with the idea that it will serve us as well as like institutions serve people in Europe. Henry Clews, the great New York financier, in his book, Fifty Years in Wall Street, says:

> Such a bank as the Bank of England, or the Bank of France could not be created, either in a day or a generation, for those time-honored institutions are the growth of ages. They are very much older than any of the other banks there, and, under the control of their respective Governments, they have grown up with their countries and become practically, although not by ownership, Government institutions. Hence their prestige and power and the impossibility of other banks superseding them.

This statement of Mr. Clews may be applied generally to the other state banks of Europe.

If we are to have a central bank it must be so planned that it will deserve and command the fullest confidence of the public so that in times of stress it can stem the tide of panic. It must above all other things be solvent and possessed of ample means, in excess of its own immediate liabilities that are available at any time for use in helping others. Let us see if this bank is planned to be solvent. This bank is to organize when $100,000,000 of its capital stock is paid in. As soon as it is organized it becomes its duty to purchase within one year thereafter all the 2 per cent Government bonds then on deposit with the Comptroller of the Currency as security for our present bank-note circulation, amounting to about $700,000,000. It is authorized to and must pay for these bonds by issuing bank notes of its own. When this has been done what is the status of this bank? It holds $100,000,000 of capital and $700,000,000 in bonds, and owes $700,000,000 upon its notes. You strike a balance and there is left $100,000,000, and of course you say it is solvent. But this plan provides that the bonds so purchased must be held by this bank during the period of its corporate existence, except that after five years the Secretary of the Treasury may permit the bank to sell not to exceed $50,000,000 of them each year thereafter, to which is added a proviso that the Government reserves the right to purchase at par or pay any of these bonds at any time. This in effect locks up these bonds and prevents their use as a means for obtaining money with which to meet the bank notes. It may be contended that this bank has general power to borrow money against any of its bonds, but this provision is clearly not applicable to these bonds, as the proposed act expressly provides that the bank shall continue to hold them. The right to pledge these bonds as security necessarily carries with it the right to part with title to them. If this bank is to have this right then it may suffer them to be sold and with the proceeds retire all its bank notes and thus contract our currency $700,000,000 or more. The plan clearly contemplates that this bank shall start with outstanding obligations of $700,000,000 due on demand, and shall have as available assets for the payment of this enormous indebtedness only $100,000,000. But even this $100,000,000 has a string to it that prevents its use. It is provided that 25 per cent of this $700,000,000, or $175,000,000, must be held against these notes as a reserve, so that instead of having for use $100,000,000, the first duty of the bank will be to go out and borrow $75,000,000 more of reserve money. To do this it will not only be necessary to borrow $75,000,000, but enough more to provide a reserve against this added indebtedness. It will take $112,500,000 more to make a sufficient amount to enable the bank to call itself technically solvent. It will then have an indebtedness of $812,500,000, and still it will not have a dollar available for the redemption of any of its notes without borrowing the money. And this is the bank that is to help others when people lose faith in the solvency of all banks.

The object of purchasing these bonds is to retire seven hundred million of our present bank notes and substitute in place of them notes of this bank, and this is on the plea that it will substitute a better class of notes. Are these notes going to be better? Our present notes are not only guaranteed by the Government, but are a direct obligation and a first lien upon the assets of the banks issuing them. It is not a guaranty that has to be enforced by a sheriff's sale of bonds or on liquidation 50 years hence. The banks are required to keep a fund with the Government for the redemption of their notes, and all notes are paid on demand by the United States whether the bank whose note is presented for payment has enough money there for the purpose or not. In the year ending October 31, 1911, more than $587,000,000, or about 80 per cent of all notes in circulation, were so redeemed. If every note had been presented it would have been paid either by the Government or by the bank issuing it, not by borrowing money belonging to some one else but with money belonging to the banks. The Government is not to guarantee the notes of this central bank or hold any fund or security to compel their redemption, nor are the banks liable except as stockholders, and then only in the event that this central bank becomes bankrupt. Our bank notes are as good as gold, and the method under which they are issued saves to our Government in interest more than ten millions annually. It makes it possible to issue bonds that cost us only about 1½ per cent per annum, while if this plan goes into effect we shall probably have difficulty in selling bonds in the future at 3 per cent.

It is apparent that this plan would collapse at once if suitable provision was made for the redemption of these notes. This bank is expressly prohibited from having any domestic transaction with anyone except the Government and its stockholders. This clearly forbids this bank from redeeming any of its notes unless presented by the Government or one of its stockholders. Still, a bank or trust company not a stockholder is compelled to accept pay in these notes. Should these notes depreciate in value, this arrangement will in effect give to the banks that are stockholders a first lien upon the funds of the central bank. They could present these notes for redemption and receive par in the money held by the central bank, while others could not reach this fund and would have to pocket their losses. This would inevitably discredit these notes.

Another contrivance to prevent the collapse of this bank is the provision that its notes may be held by other banks as part of their reserves. This is a departure from a time-honored policy, but is no doubt necessary if the scheme is to float at all, even on the high tide of prosperity. This makes a market for these notes and will tend to prevent their return for redemption. But this will enable the banks to discriminate against the greenbacks and silver certificates and may cause us no end of trouble, especially as no limit is placed upon the size of the bank notes that may be issued. Foreign Governments are careful to limit the size of such notes. The Bank of England can not issue a note for less than £5, or about $25. The provision that these bank notes may be held as bank reserves makes it possible to have an almost unlimited expansion of currency and credits. Banks may transfer their gold to the central bank in exchange for its bank notes, and for every dollar of gold so secured this bank may issue two of its own notes, $1 to effect the exchange and $1 in discounting paper. There is more than $1,500,000,000 of gold in circulation. The silver money and greenbacks can also be made to do double duty. The banks can gather up this currency and place it on deposit with this central bank, and while there they may still count it as reserves in their own vaults. As soon as it reaches the central bank, that institution may, in discounting paper, issue against these reserves bank notes equal to their amount. The silver and greenbacks equal another billion. Still, this is only a small fraction of expansion made possible by this plan. The other banks can take these notes and build upon them a credit structure that would stagger the most reckless speculator that ever trod the turf.

The one thing in our present credit system that tends to keep speculation somewhat within reason is the limit that our reserve money automatically puts upon bank loans. A bank can not legally loan out all of its deposits. When it is remembered that the chief business of a bank is to borrow money and reloan it, and that much of this money are deposits due on demand, it is evident that reserves play a very important part. The national banks are required to keep, on an average, one-sixth of their deposits to repay them. As the amount reserved for that purpose decreases the bank must curtail or collect in loans so as to have on hand money to meet further withdrawals of deposits. This tends to limit the amount of loans that a bank can make, as there is a limit on the amount of money that can be used as reserves. This plan removes that limitation by permitting these bank notes, the amount of which is practically unlimited, to be used as reserve money by other banks. Not only does the plan provide that the $700,000,000 of notes issued to retire our present bank-note circulation, not now reserve money, may be held by other banks as reserves, but that every dollar issued by this central bank in its business may be so held.

It is urged that such expansion is not possible. The reasons chiefly relied on are that the bank can only invest its funds in short-time commercial paper, and that there is a tax upon the bank notes if they exceed nine hundred million. The class of paper that it may invest in can easily be provided, as I will try to explain a little later on, and if I correctly construe the provision in regard to the tax upon bank notes, it might as well be frankly admitted that no tax is contemplated. It is barely possible that a situation might arise that would permit the imposition of a tax, but it is such a remote possibility that it is almost negligible. The advocates of the plan usually claim that all notes in excess of $900,000,000 are to be taxed, but that is not correct. The provision is that all notes in excess of nine hundred million not covered by an equal amount of money held by the central bank shall be taxed. Under this plan the other banks may deposit with this central bank, say, five hundred million or more of their reserves. Against this $500,000,000 then held by the central bank as a reserve it could, in discounting paper to that amount, issue in payment therefor its own notes. The central bank would then have outstanding $500,000,000 in bank notes and owe $500,000,000 to its depositors, or a total of one thousand million. It would hold the $500,000,000 in money to cover the notes, and this same money would, under the plan, serve as a sufficient reserve against the one thousand million dollars, as only 50 per cent of the total liabilities of the bank are required as a reserve. The provision that the note holders have a first lien upon the assets would make whatever money might be in its vaults cover the notes, and as a consequence this $500,000,000 of bank notes would have to be deducted from the total of bank notes outstanding in determining the amount of the tax to be paid. In other words, for every dollar that the Government or a bank deposits with this central bank it may issue another dollar of tax-free notes; and as the banks can, without loss to themselves, put all the reserves that they are now required under the law to keep in their own vaults in this central bank to swell the amount deposited there by the Government, it is evident that $900,000,000 is only a fraction of the untaxed currency provided for.

The Monetary Commission recognizes the danger which this plan presents. It says in its report:

> Our main reliance for preventing undue expansion must, however, be found in the wise management of the local and district associations and the reserve association.

If the proposed bank had behind it centuries of careful, wise, and honest management as have most of the European central banks we might have less hesitation. There custom, tantamount to unwritten law, restrains and guides such banks. Here no such custom exists. Still we propose to start a like institution with greater capital and almost limitless powers. The Bank of England, the most powerful financial institution on earth, has no such power to issue bank notes. The English Government owes to it a little less than $90,000,000, and to that extent it may issue bank notes, but for every dollar that it issues in excess of this it must hold an equal amount of gold in its vaults, and for every note that the bank issues the stockholders are individually liable. The Scotch banks are often spoken of as authorized to issue bank notes in unlimited figures against their assets. They have no such power. They may issue a small amount of uncovered notes. The aggregate that all can issue is about $15,000,000. Beyond this amount, which is fixed by their charters, they are limited like the Bank of England to the issue of notes covered by gold in their vaults and their stockholders are also liable individually for all the notes issued. No danger of overexpansion in either England or Scotland. The Bank of Germany may issue a little less than $131,000,000 of uncovered and tax-free notes, and in addition it may issue an amount equal to whatever money it may have in its vaults. Beyond this it can not issue a dollar without paying a tax upon the issue of 5 per cent per annum. This tax makes the issue unprofitable and checks expansion. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1911 shows that this bank holds cash in excess of its circulating notes. The total issue of the Bank of France against gold coin and other assets is limited by law to about $1,100,000,000 against which it holds about $700,000,000 in gold besides Government securities and other assets. Outside of a comparatively small amount due to it from France it aims to keep all its issue covered with gold. It believes in keeping its feet upon the rock of real values and ascribes the low interest rate in France not to its power to issue notes, but to its large reserve in gold.

In connection with this it is important to consider that those banks, in countries where confidence in such institutions is no doubt much greater than this bank can hope to secure, feel constrained to hold reserves ranging from 50 to 100 per cent of their liabilities. These figures are very significant when it is remembered that the policy pursued by those banks is to invest their money in the highest class of mercantile paper due almost on demand, so that practically every dollar of their indebtedness, including the bank notes, can be paid in a few days. How radically different is the arrangement in this plan? It prescribes a reserve of 50 per cent of all liabilities, but modifies this by allowing this central bank to deduct from such liabilities in figuring such reserves an amount equal to one-half of the seven hundred million of bonds that it is to purchase. This means that the seven hundred million of bank notes issued in place of the present notes are to be secured by a reserve of only 25 per cent, and this notwithstanding the fact that this bank is charged with the duty of keeping the bonds upon which they are supposed to rest during the period of its corporate existence. And let us not forget that this seven hundred million is only one item of our credit currency. Our greenbacks and depreciated silver swell this to enormous figures. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency to which I have referred says that we have already $784,000,000 of uncovered paper in addition to about $700,000,000 of silver worth 50 per cent of its face. France has the next largest amount of uncovered paper—some 223,000,000—and the largest amount of silver—some 400,000,000. But this is not all. Not only is the foundation upon which this staggering load of credit currency rests to be undermined and weakened, but to make collapse doubly sure the Monetary Commission makes provision for 200,000,000 more of untaxed notes which, they say, business will demand, and for fear that not even this will satisfy the greed of speculation they add to this vast sum 300,000,000 more at a nominal tax of 1½ per cent, and then they urge this plan as one in the interest of safety and as a panacea against panics. Why not advertise for a barrel of whisky for a drunken man to sober up on?

The history of every panic shows that it was due to an overexpansion of credits. Bankers and business men borrowed more money than they could pay. Suddenly everybody concluded to have a day of reckoning, and we called it a panic. We have just tried this kind of a remedy against panics. When the speculative craze that culminated in 1907 was staggering to its ruin in the fall of 1906, with call money from 30 to 40 per cent in New York, the Secretary of the Treasury, at the behest of the banks, forced into circulation in the course of two months $100,000,000 of bank notes besides some $23,000,000 of Government gold from the Treasury, but it only added zest to the spirit of speculation and made the gloom of 1907 still darker.

We all remember the panic of 1893. Are we willing to legislate to create another such disaster? During the panic of 1893 we had afloat about $346,000,000 of greenbacks, and our silver circulation was about $190,000,000 below par, making a total of credit money of $536,000,000 besides the bank notes. For the maintenance of this money at par the vast resources, the boundless credit and the faith of this Government was pledged. It held in the Treasury the seigniorage upon the silver coinage worth some $70,000,000 and a reserve in gold of about $100,000,000; still what happened? The Treasury was forced to sell $362,000,000 in bonds, at 4 and 5 per cent interest, to secure enough gold to keep this money at par, and President Cleveland hastened to call Congress together for the express purpose of repealing the so-called Sherman Silver Purchasing Act, under which some $50,000,000 in silver was added to our circulation each year. A very insignificant sum when it is remembered that the silver was purchased at its actual value and no more silver dollars were issued than an amount at par equal to the money paid for the silver.

When this central bank is in operation we shall still have the same amount of greenbacks as we had then. We have a larger amount of silver, and it is worth considerably less per dollar, as the silver in the silver dollar was then about 67 cents, while now it is worth only about 50. Our bank-note circulation was then only about $375,000,000, while now it is in excess of $700,000,000, to which it is proposed to add untold millions, not of notes resting upon available resources and subject to prompt redemption, but notes that must be kept afloat to prevent bankruptcy, and that can only be kept afloat by borrowing from Peter to pay Paul. This bank is to start with a demand liability seven times greater than its available resources, a liability which it is in effect forbidden to pay during its corporate existence. Its very life depends upon an irredeemable bank-note circulation. Every argument that has been made against fiat money can be made against this plan. It is surprising that men who in the past have steadfastly opposed all such schemes appear to favor this. Do the lessons of the past serve no useful purpose? The limitations imposed upon the banks of issue in Europe are the result of sad experience. In England those limitations were written in 1844 as the result of the panics of 1825, 1836, and 1839, all due, as the people of England then believed and still believe, to an excessive issue of bank notes. No amount of persuasion has induced the English people to relax these restrictions, though often a subject of bitter controversy.

Not only is the power to issue bank notes rigidly limited in most countries, but there appears to be a growing disposition to provide for a large measure of governmental control—not simply supervision. The central banks of Germany and France are controlled by their respective Governments; and the Bank of England is so closely allied to the English Government that it is almost a Government institution, though privately managed. The German Government actually manages the Bank of Germany. The stockholders may advise and may prevent the bank from making loans to the Government, but are otherwise practically without influence. The governor of the Bank of France is appointed by the State. He has the general direction of the affairs of the bank, presides at all meetings of the directors, and may veto any of their acts. No paper can be discounted that he disapproves of, and he appoints all the employees. This plan for a central bank gives the Government absolutely no control; a provision is even inserted in the proposed bill to prevent Congress from amending the act except at the end of each 10-year period. All the participation that the Government is accorded in the management of this bank is just about enough to permit it to have some knowledge of what the bank may do. I would hesitate to place such a bank under the management of the National Government, but I hesitate still more to turn over to such an institution without any security, as is proposed, hundreds of millions of Government money each year—the money that the Government must have to maintain its very existence. Under the proposed act it is not discretionary with the Government to deposit its money with this bank; it must do so.

I have but little patience with the extreme solicitude expressed by many that politics may interfere with such a bank. If it should pursue a course injurious to the public, politics ought to interfere; if it does not, the danger is extremely slight. It is almost impossible to stir public interest and feeling sufficiently to correct any evil, let alone doing to business an act of injustice when it is pursuing a proper and legitimate course. But is there not another side to this question of politics? May we not hesitate to form this vast combination of all the banks in this country, with their hundreds of thousands of stockholders scattered over every hamlet between the two seas? If this central bank is formed, it will bind together all the banks and give them many interests in common. Contemplate the vast power that this organization will have, not only over banks, but over business and the Government itself. It will have power to reward and punish friends and enemies. It will bring into close touch with the vast banking and business interests men who are natural leaders. These men will inevitably drift into politics, and with such an organization behind them, cemented together by self-interest and class pride, can you measure its power? Perfect this organization and put it behind any demand for additional privileges, for additional favors, and what will happen? I do not believe that it is of the slightest importance that Wall Street is not given direct control. No such organization can possibly escape Wall Street domination.

No country has a counterpart to this scheme. In every other country care is taken to keep the central banks as independent of other banks as possible. Here just the opposite is proposed. Is it good sense to provide that the banks that elect the officers of this central bank and its branches shall apply to those very officers and have them grant or refuse the favors they ask—officers that must depend upon the good will of those banks to retain their positions—or to provide that a board elected by the banks, and in effect their agents, shall determine how high a rate they must pay this central bank to discount their assets? The Government is to get the earnings of this central bank beyond 5 per cent upon the stock; but with this power in the banks to fix the rate of discount, how much profit do you suppose the Government will get? How different is the position of the manager of a European central bank. There he occupies a quasi public position. He is charged, either by law or custom, with the duty of guarding the currency of the country and with protecting both public and private interests. He is uninfluenced by past favors or promises of future rewards. His position permits and demands of him his best judgment in the interest of all. In considering whether this bank is planned to be solvent it is of the utmost importance to know that the officers in charge are bound not only by their honor as men, but also by self-interest to maintain its solvency.

Those who advocate this plan never tire of telling us what a great advantage this central bank would be in that it would hold the reserves of other banks and thus be able to supply other banks with an abundance of money if needed. The impression put afloat is that the reserves deposited with this central bank are to be treated as a common fund for all the banks. Nothing could be further from the truth. A bank that may have any of its reserves in this central bank can only draw its own. The impression is even abroad that all reserve money is to go into this central bank, but that is not the plan. The law in regard to reserves is to remain practically unchanged except that any money deposited with the central bank may be counted as a part of the reserve of the bank making the deposit. This means that a bank may strip itself of all its reserves. It may leave in New York or other reserve city, if a country bank, three-fifths of its reserves as under the present law and send the balance to the central bank. If the plan provided for sending all or any considerable part of the reserves to this central bank, the protest would be long and loud. Care has been taken that the reserve city banks are not to suffer. They are still to be permitted to pay interest on reserves that other banks may deposit with them, while the central bank is not permitted to pay a penny. This arrangement will permit the central reserve city banks to retain their present deposits of bank reserves. Still this central bank may accumulate some reserves, as it is not expected to pay out any money. If a bank withdraws its deposits from this central bank it can not secure any relief. The method by which a bank is to secure any reserve money from the central bank is to sell it some of its assets and have the central bank print some notes and give to it in payment. This is the much-vaunted method of making available our bank reserves—the one feature that appears to have appealed to the Monetary Commission so strongly that it gave to its creation the name National Reserve Association.

A lack of elasticity in our currency has been the stock argument of every advocate of asset currency and is, of course, presented in support of this plan. It is true that if this bank is established it could, with the aid of the other banks, expand the currency to an almost unlimited extent, and with such aid contract the currency several hundred millions below what we now have by using our bank reserves to pay notes issued in place of our present notes. The expansion and contraction of asset currency is often spoken of as automatic, and where redemption of the notes is promptly compelled, that is to some extent true; but no one can seriously contend that there will be anything automatic in the issue and retirement of the bank notes proposed under this plan. The large commercial nations of Europe have striven to prevent their banks of issue from exercising the power of expanding and contracting the currency. Are we willing to put this power in this bank? The small amount of uncovered and untaxed notes in England, Germany, and France are a permanent part of the circulation of those countries and do not serve the purpose of expanding or contracting the currency. Instead of giving to the Bank of England the power to expand or contract, great care has been taken to deprive it of any such power. Mr. Horace White, in his book Money and Banking, says, speaking of the Bank of England:

> Nobody has any discretion as to the amount of notes which shall be in existence at any time. Setting aside the fixed sum issued against securities the remainder of the circulation is just what it would be if it were composed of gold exclusively.

To prevent the Bank of England from making use of its note-issuing power to expand or contract the currency the bank act of 1844, now in force, separates the issue department from the banking department of the bank and determines the amount of money that may be transferred from one to the other. The method employed by the European banks to expand and contract the currency is this: To contract, they raise the rate of discount, which is in effect the same as raising the rate of interest. This discourages persons from selling papers to the bank, as it becomes too expensive for objects not absolutely necessary. In the meantime the bank's assets, such as bills of exchange and notes that it may have purchased, become due and are collected in, and money from these accumulates in its vaults. A high rate of discount also tempts people to purchase paper, and this releases to the banks the hoarded money. By lowering the rate of discount and using this money in the purchase of paper the currency is again increased.

A bank acting on this principle can not afford to charge too high a rate of discount as it will drive away business and cause a loss of profit in its competition with other banks, nor can it afford to make the rate too low for fear that it will not have money enough with which to meet its own obligations. This is the method relied upon by the central banks of England, Germany, and France. The tax of 5 per cent upon the German note makes such notes unprofitable unless rates are very high. The tax upon each note issued by the Bank of France is small; but as the French people are not accustomed to the general use of checks these notes must do double duty and circulate so rapidly that the expense of maintaining them in circulation and securing them by a sufficient reserve makes the tax a heavy burden. It is claimed by that bank that it actually suffers a loss upon its circulation. The method of these banks is simply to save up their own money when they anticipate that they will have use for it in the future and loan it out when they can afford to do so. The proposition here presented is to allow our banks to loan every dollar that they can buy, borrow, or get in any fashion, and then if they run short sell some of their notes to this central bank and have it start the printing press to run off some more money so they can go on and loan still more. This is an old scheme, often exploited, of living on the interest on the debts that you owe. It is not safe. It never was safe as a business proposition. The rugged, stubborn, common sense of England, Germany, and France, wise from sad experience, restrains by rigid rules the greed that kites credits upon credits. They insist that business shall not be done on hope and faith alone, but that at least some fair share of the money that is used must be earned before it is spent.

The diligent care with which the interests of certain banks have been guarded is manifest, not only in prohibiting this central bank from paying interest on bank reserves deposited with it, while other banks may do so, but in the absolute monopoly that the banks are to enjoy as sole owners of its capital stock and sole beneficiaries of its powers. No one can deal with it except the Government and a bank owning stock in it. The citizen, if he is to profit at all, must first pay toll to some intervening bank. It is true that the European banks deal chiefly with their respective Governments and the banks, but I doubt that any central bank can be found that does not deal with the citizen on equal terms with the banks; they do in England, Germany, and France. This is very important. It is the means by which those central banks protect the citizen against unfair treatment from other banks. Without according this privilege to the citizen it is idle to contend that this bank will equalize rates of interest in the different parts of the country. Not even the fact that the Government is required to deposit with this central bank hundreds of millions of the people's money each year, and that without interest or security, is considered a sufficient reason for allowing the citizen to deal with it. The Bank of France, when first organized, dealt only with the Government and the banks, but that has long since been changed. It must serve all alike and not a favored few.

From a study of the class of paper upon which money may be obtained from this central bank, it is apparent that not only is the public to be excluded from dealing with it, but the country banks are placed in very nearly the same position. It will be noticed that outside of Government and State bonds, which country banks seldom carry, there are only two classes of paper that can be discounted by a bank without the guarantee of a local association composed of not less than 10 banks with an aggregate capital and surplus of not less than $5,000,000, namely, certain notes and bills bearing two names, due in 28 days, and made not less than 30 days prior to the day of sale, and accepted bills of exchange due in 90 days bearing three names.

Very few country banks would have any considerable quantity of such 28-day paper, and if they did it would be quite useless to attempt to discount it. When a country bank needs to discount at all it nearly always requires a loan for a longer time. A sale of such paper would not ordinarily give 28 days, as a bank could seldom furnish a supply that would all mature in just that time. The average date of maturity would be nearer half that time, and as the bank selling has to indorse the paper it would have to repay the central bank as the paper became due to protect its indorsement and its customers. This would be a mere waste of time. Country banks deal in notes, and have, as a rule, few opportunities to obtain 90-day bills of exchange. Such a bill may be discounted the day it is made, while a promissory note, given for the same consideration, bearing the same responsible signatures, and in legal effect exactly the same, can not be discounted unless it is due in 28 days and was made not less than 30 days before the day of sale or is guaranteed by the local association.

To get these acceptances the banks in the large commercial cities will say to the wholesaler, the jobber, or the manufacturer: "We can not use your note. When you sell goods on time you will have to ask the purchaser to accept a bill due in the future. With your indorsement we can sell that at the central bank and get money for 90 days; on your note we can only get money for 28 days, and then only after you have held that note for 30 days." This leaves the country bank with practically no opportunity to get money from the central bank. His only other chance is to secure the guarantee of his paper by the local association, but as this has to be paid for in addition to the discount on his note at the central bank and as an application for such a guarantee would probably be considered as a sign of weakness, he would no doubt have to depend for his accommodations upon some bank that could deal with this central bank. This advantage on the part of the banks in the large commercial centers would unavoidably give them control of the central bank; their influence over the country banks would easily be sufficient so as to permit them to name the officers. Once in the hands of a few large financial interests, rules could be adopted that might discriminate still more effectively against the country banks.

The plan of the Monetary Commission does not attempt to remedy the real defect in our banking system. The law permits the national banks not located in a reserve or central reserve city to deposit three-fifths of their reserves with banks in the central reserve cities, namely, New York, Chicago, and St. Louis. Banks in New York City bid for these deposits by paying interest upon them and then use these reserves in stock-exchange transactions of a character very close akin to gambling. When the banks that have made these deposits need their money it can not be returned if there is any unusual demand, as they are tied up in stocks and bonds that are not marketable.

The banks in New York City get the bulk of these deposits and have as to bank reserves the same duties to perform as have the central banks of Europe; but how do they perform that function? They hold close to $450,000,000 due to other banks, besides an enormous amount of other deposits. Six banks in New York held during the panic of 1907 more than $600,000,000 of deposits, of which more than half was due to other banks. These six banks held more deposits than the central banks of England, Germany, and France combined, and against these enormous liabilities they held less than half the reserves considered necessary in those countries, and assets, many of them, that those European banks dare not touch.

This plan provides for no change in this arrangement. The New York banks are still to continue to hold the same share of the reserves of other banks, and their business is to be in no wise limited or disturbed. This situation, created by a statute that in effect sends these bank deposits to New York—as that is the only place under the law where they can be kept and draw interest—has been the chief source of our troubles. When banks attempt to withdraw from New York any considerable part of these reserves it creates a money stringency, and if the withdrawal is unusually large it precipitates a panic. It is in this artificial, stilted credit system built upon these reserves that the danger exists. This is clearly shown in our past experiences. Every panic has started in New York, because of a lack of ability on the part of the New York banks to meet their obligations. A failure of the New York banks to pay necessarily involves every bank that has money on deposit with them, and so a panic in New York means a panic all over the country.

As a remedy against this situation it has been suggested that interest should not be permitted on bank reserves. This would tend to prevent the congestion of so large a part of these reserves in New York and thus lessen the danger of a country-wide panic when speculation runs riot there. But the chief merit of this suggestion is that the New York banks would not be compelled to make loans to earn the interest which they must pay in their competitive race for these deposits. They would then be able and might be required to hold larger reserves and conduct their business on safer lines. It is claimed that it would not be practicable for Congress to pass a law to prevent banks from paying interest on such deposits, because State banks would still continue the practice; but I can see no good reason why an excise tax could not be imposed upon all banks, State as well as national, that do not hold reserves such as Congress may prescribe and upon all deposits payable on demand subject to interest. Such tax could be made to effect the purpose.

Upon a comparison of our system of money and banking with the systems of the most successful countries of Europe I believe that the impartial observer will find that ours is far better adapted to our needs than any European system that we could import. Here a bank in a city or a village is owned and managed by the citizens of the place, who are interested not only in the bank, but also in the prosperity of the town, and consequently devote the money of the bank to the local needs of the community. The officers are often the leading men in their respective towns and among the most public-spirited. They are not, as most of the bank managers in Europe, mere agents, managing branches of some larger institution, controlled at a distance by men who do not know and care less about the place. The money controlled under a branch-bank system will go where it can earn the most without regard to other considerations. Our bankers have greatly aided us in building up our country. They know intimately the character of our business men and the needs of the communities they serve. They encourage local enterprise at a risk that no branch-bank system would tolerate.

Aside from this difference there is much more similarity between money and banking here and in Europe than the advocates of this plan would have us believe. Take, for instance, England. It has outstanding a small amount of uncovered bank notes; they are no safer, more flexible, or serviceable than ours. They are secured by an indebtedness from England to the Bank of England and by the assets of that bank, the same as our bank notes, which are issued by our Government, secured by Government bonds and the assets of the banks to which they are issued. The other bank notes of England are issued by this bank against gold, which it must hold dollar for dollar in its vaults. Our Government performs the function of issuing like notes, and against every one of them it holds its equivalent in gold. These notes, or gold certificates, as they are called, are in every way as good as the English bank note. These gold notes would be greatly weakened if the function of issuing them should be transferred to this central bank, as this bank is to hold only 50 per cent instead of dollar for dollar for their redemption, and instead of having back of them the Government of the United States this bank would promise to redeem them if one of its stockholders should ask for it. The German system is practically the same as that of England, except that the Bank of Germany may issue uncovered notes on the payment of a tax of 5 per cent per annum. In this respect it is more like our system than that of England.

Under what is known as the Vreeland-Aldrich Act—the act that created the Monetary Commission—authority was given to form currency associations, with power to issue bank notes guaranteed by the United States and all the banks in the association. These notes must be secured and are subject to a graduated tax. This act also allows an individual bank, without the guaranty of the currency association, to issue such notes against bonds other than bonds of the United States, but subject to a like tax. Currency associations have been organized and are prepared to issue bank notes at any time in case of real need. This gives to our currency much greater elasticity than that of England. It makes it possible for our banks to convert their assets into bank notes. This is the one thing for which the plan of the Monetary Commission is especially commended—the one and only feature of the plan guaranteed to cure panics. Without this power the central bank would be a wreck that even the rats would desert. Strange that those who favor this central bank do not appear to have heard of the currency associations; still, they would no doubt be every bit as effective against a panic as this central bank, and they are much safer, as they do not encourage panics by an overexpansion of currency and credits. It is for fear of encouraging such expansion that England has steadily refused to even provide for an emergency currency.

Most of those who are anxious for currency and banking reform appear to be chiefly concerned in the profits they hope to reap from tax-free notes. I want to be certain that reform means greater safety to the public and that the profit on uncovered notes goes to the Government. The act creating the currency associations provides for their termination in 1914. These associations should be continued, and, rather than the central bank, I would give them power to hold Government deposits and bank reserves. Let the banks guarantee and sell to them short-time commercial paper for notes of these associations, guaranteed by all the banks, like our emergency currency. Prevent the use of these notes as reserves and tax them like the German bank note, so they will only be issued during periods of great business activity. Let each association raise or lower the rate at which it may purchase paper or raise the interest on the notes to enable it to husband its resources. In lieu of interest on bank deposits payable on demand provide that the currency associations furnish to banks depositing with them exchange on other currency associations in some proportion to such deposits. The notes of a currency association would, aside from the paper for the purchase of which they may be issued, have behind them the Government and all the assets of all the banks in the association issuing them, instead of the narrow foundation upon which is to rest the whole credit structure of the United States according to the plan of the Monetary Commission, namely, one-tenth of the capital stock of the banks that may become stockholders of the central bank. If the currency associations were given the powers I suggest, it would practically accomplish the legitimate objects sought by the Monetary Commission in the creation of a central bank, but it would not permit one section of this large country to dominate the destinies of the entire country. It would tend to build money centers in different sections capable of caring for the business of such sections.

I submit these observations because of the strenuous efforts that are being put forth to impose upon the country what seems to me a dangerous, utterly selfish, and un-American proposition.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL].

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to a very able paper on the subject of the water-front development of Hudson County, N. J.

Mr. John C. Payne, the author of this paper, is a civil engineer who has been identified with the professional life of New Jersey for the past 35 years. He is a well-known expert in litigation where engineering questions are in dispute. He has been honored by many appointments on commissions for the determination of questions of interest to the State. He was appointed by Gov. Edward C. Stokes as a member of a commission, of which ex-Gov. Franklin Murphy and ex-Gov. Foster M. Voorhees were members, to investigate and report on the whole subject of franchises granted by municipalities to public-utilities corporations. He was appointed by the court, together with ex-Gov. George T. Werts and Col. John J. Toffey, to appraise the value and damages to the terminal lands on the Hudson River of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. taken for and affected by the construction of the Hudson River tunnels of the Manhattan & Hudson River Railroad. He was appointed by Hon. Charles J. Parker, judge of the supreme court, a member of the Martin Act commission to adjust and levy the immense arrearage of taxes which had accumulated in Jersey City by reason of the failure of the citizens to pay and the inadequacy of the laws to enforce the collection of the same.

In 1876 Mr. Payne associated himself in the work of the riparian commission of the State of New Jersey with the Hon. Robert C. Bacot, the first engineer of the commission, who was appointed in 1864, and in the annual report of the State riparian commission to the governor of the State for the year 1907 the board made the following official and public recognition of the work of Mr. Payne:

The board desires to officially express its recognition of the fidelity and professional skill exercised by its secretary and engineer in the work of the commission.

Mr. John C. Payne has been associated with the work of the riparian commission for 30 years. He associated himself in 1877 with the Hon. Robert C. Bacot, the first engineer of the commission, appointed in 1864, and when Mr. Bacot, by reason of declining years, retired, in 1897, with honor and the respect of the commission and State, Mr. Payne succeeded him as secretary and engineer, and has continued as such until the present time; and the board takes pleasure in testifying to Mr. Payne's fidelity to the work of the commission and to the interests of the State committed to its care.

Mr. Payne is still the secretary and engineer of this important State commission, and attended the recent Eighth Annual Convention of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, at Washington, by appointemnt as a delegate by Hon. Woodrow Wilson, governor of New Jersey.

The paper referred to is as follows:

HUDSON COUNTY—ITS WATER-FRONT DEVELOPMENT.

Paper read before the Historical Society of Hudson County by John C. Payne, C. E., secretary and engineer of the Riparian Commission of the State of New Jersey, Thursday evening, March 25, 1909.

"Although our paper to-night has primarily to do with the development of the water front of Hudson County, I shall not attempt to go into the details of land transfers or the names of enterprises with useful but tiresome statistics which are the units that go to make up the grand sum of our worth; and I shall ask you to go with me to other parts of our State for some of the illustrations of the principles on which riparian interests are administered.

"Nor, indeed, shall I attempt to fully cover the ground of legal inquiry and decision of all the cases that have claimed the attention of our courts, for that would make my paper far too long, and my purpose is rather to attempt to give a general view of the principles upon which the water front of our county has been developed.

ORIGIN OF THE STATE'S TITLE.

"The title of the State to the lands flowed by tide water at mean high tide is as ancient as the discovery and conquest of the country, because it is founded on the ancient law.

"Briefly, the history of the discovery and occupation of this part of the country is:

"That in 1497 Jean and Sebastian Cabot, under commission of Henry VII of England, sailed along the coast of North America and claimed for their sovereign the entire country the shore of which they occasionally saw at a distance.

"In 1524 J. De Verrazzano, a Florentine, in the service of Francis I, King of France, is supposed to have visited the Bay of New York.

"In 1525 Estavan Gomez, a Portuguese, in the service of Emperor Charles V, visited the Bay of New York.

"In 1598 some Dutch, in the employ of the Greenland Co., came into the Bay of New York and erected a winter shelter and a fort for protection against the incursions of the Indians.

"In 1603 Henry IV of France, by virtue of the discoveries of De Verrazzano in 1524, above referred to, gave to Des Monts that portion of the country lying between the fortieth and forty-sixth degrees of north latitude. This included the greater part of New Jersey; but the grant of the French King was ignored by James I of England, who, in 1606, granted to the South Virginia, or London Co., and the North Virginia Co. practically the same land.

"From the time of the earliest discoveries up to the Revolution the occupation and control of this part of the country was passed back and forth among the Dutch, the French, the English, and the Indians, and an account of this period, as affecting the locality, will be found in the interesting papers already read to you by Dr. Brett and Mr. Daniel Van Winkle, of this society.

"The title of the State to the lands under water is founded on the ancient doctrine of the sovereignty of the King. The first diversion of the title of the King is that of the grant from Charles II to James, the Duke of York, March 12, 1664. This grant covered much of the land along the coast from Maryland to Maine, and on June 24, 1664, James, the Duke of York, sold to Berkeley and Carteret that part of the grant from King Charles of March 12, 1664, now known as New Jersey, and in 1676 New Jersey was divided into East and West Jersey and held by what were known as the lords proprietors.

"In the year 1702 these proprietors surrendered to Queen Anne all the rights of government held by them, reserving, however, the rights of property. The title to the soil of the tidal waters was not within the reservation, but again passed by the surrender of the government of the proprietors to the Crown of England.

"Thus the title to the lands under water, being vested in the King of Great Britain, at and before the Revolution of 1776 became vested by the law of nations and the right of conquest in the people of the then Colony and now State of New Jersey by the successful War of Independence.

"Previous to this time, however, what is known as the board of proprietors of East Jersey set up the claim of title to lands and lands under water under grants made March 12, 1664, and June 29, 1674, by Charles II of England to James, Duke of York, and by the latter to Sir George Carteret and John, Lord Berkeley, June 24, 1664, and July 29, 1674; and by the legal representatives of Sir George Carteret to the said board of proprietors, February 1 and 2, 1683; and by a confirmation of said board of proprietors, made by James, Duke of York, March 14, 1683; and by divers other instruments, Indian titles, and otherwise. They claimed to have been recognized as owners of the lands under water by express acts of the Colonial Government and to have made large numbers of grants of said lands.

"The proprietors' right of property in the lands above water was and is unquestioned, but that of their rights in lands under water has been the subject of much discussion and litigation. The decision, adverse to their rights, is the case of Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet., p. 367), by the majority of the judges of the United States Supreme Court, and has been generally accepted as a final settlement of the question; but the opinion of the minority of that court was so strongly in favor of the rights of the proprietors that it has left a lingering question in their minds, which occasionally finds expression in grants of lands flowed by tidewater, which grants, however, are not recognized by the authorities of the State of New Jersey.

"The original grant to the proprietors was in consideration of what they expressed as a 'competent sum of money,' and in addition to all the lands in the described boundaries gave

"All rivers, mines, minerals, woods, fishings, hawkings, huntings, and fowlings, and all other royalties, profits, commodities, and hereditaments whatsoever.

"And I presume, on the strength of this wording, they based their claim of title to lands under water, which claim, however, has never been admitted by the State, but has been successfully contested.

"This title gave the proprietors rights in all the lands and general property in the Province, and also in the Government. The right of government was exercised until 1702, when it was surrendered to the Queen. The whole property was subject to the rights of its Indian owners, and the grant from the King gave the proprietors the exclusive privilege of purchasing from the Indians. (See William Penn and others on this subject, Gordon's New Jersey, pp. 40, 41.) This privilege, though contested in the earliest provincial courts, was always sustained, and at the session of the first legislature after the proprietors' surrender to the Government, the law first enacted was that 'for regulating the purchasing of lands from the Indians.' (Neville, p. 1.) This law forbid, with heavy penalty, any person purchasing lands from the Indians except by authority of the proprietors; declared all such purchases previously made illegal, and required the possessors to take title from the proprietors within six months thereafter.

"The Indians highly valued their rights of fishing, as the reference to them in their deeds of sale show; and the immense quantities of shells, piled in heaps at all convenient places along the shores, bear witness that they improved these rights to great profit. There are a hundred acres or more of land at South Amboy which are covered from 6 to 18 inches deep by these Indian shell deposits. The soil about Communipaw is full of them, and they can be seen all along the creeks and bays from South Amboy to Cape May.

"The proprietors purchased all these rights of the Indians and paid satisfactory prices for them. The purchases were generally made in tracts of a few square miles each, until nearly the whole State was covered by their deeds. Many of these deeds are recorded in the proprietors' books and in the secretary of state's office, and at an assembly of all the Indian tribes of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, held at Easton, Pa., from October 8 to 26, 1758, two deeds were executed by the Indians and their attorneys, one of which, by the Delawares, was for all the land south of a line drawn from Sandy Hook up the Raritan River and its north branch to the Alamatong (Lamington) Falls, and from thence crossing to the Delaware River at the Paoqualin Mountain (Water Gap). In this the boundary along tidewater is low-water mark. The other deed, executed by the Minisink and Pompton Indians, was for all that part of the State lying north of the above-mentioned division line and terminated at the north by a straight line drawn across the country from the mouth of Tapaan in latitude 41° north, on the Hudson, to Cochecton, in latitude 41° 40' north, on the Delaware.

GRANTS BY THE PROPRIETORS.

"Among the 'surveys' or grants to individuals, covered or partially covered by the tidewaters (the word 'survey' meaning a grant), made by the proprietors within Hudson County, was one in 1746 to 'Arch Kennedy, of Bedloes Island,' and on Holland's map of 1775 Bedloes Island is called 'Kennedy's Corporation.'

"Another 'survey' or grant by the proprietors, in Hudson County, in 1803, was to 'Elisha Boudinot, Budd tract, in Harsimus Cove.'

"In 1835 a 'survey' or grant in Communipaw Cove was made by the proprietors, of 'Black Tom,' which is now a part of the national docks warehouse enterprise.

"And as recently as March 4, 1880, the proprietors of East Jersey granted to George H. Cook the reef or island on which Robbins Reef Light stands; also the reef or shoal known as 'Oyster Island,' both in New York Bay.

"With these 'surveys' or grants of 'Robbins Reef' and 'Oyster Island' from the proprietors as a basis, application was made by George H. Cook to the State of New Jersey for a confirmatory title or the rights to the lands under water surrounding these 'surveys' as lands pertaining to riparian ownership, but the application was refused by the State, and no further claim has been made under these proprietors' 'surveys' or grants.

"It will be of interest to call attention here to the attitude of the United States Government toward the title of the State of New Jersey to its lands under water, and to the machinery of the State in conserving this relation:

"On March 16, 1875, the Legislature of New Jersey passed an act entitled 'An act authorizing the cession of jurisdiction and conveyance of lands of this State under tidal waters to the United States, to be used as sites for lighthouses, beacons, and other aids to navigation' (P. L., 1875, chap. 138, p. 28). This act provided that whenever the United States desired to acquire title to lands belonging to the State of New Jersey covered by the tidal waters, for the site of a lighthouse, beacon, or other aid to navigation, application might be made to the governor by a duly authorized agent of the United States, describing the site required; and that thereupon the governor was authorized and empowered to direct the riparian commission to make a survey and map and report the same to him; whereupon the governor was to convey the title of said lands to the United States Government upon such terms and conditions as might be agreed upon. The act provided further that no single tract thus conveyed should contain more than 10 acres, and that the State of New Jersey should retain concurrent jurisdiction over the same, so that all process, civil or criminal, issuing under the authority of this State might be executed by the proper officers upon any person or persons amenable to the same within the limits of the lands granted; and provided further that no part of such lands so granted should be used for quarantine purposes; and providing, finally, for the reversion of the lands to the State upon the discontinuance of their use by the Government for the purposes for which they were ceded.

"It was under this act and without regard to the grant by the proprietors to George H. Cook of the site of Robbins Reef Lighthouse, that is so attractive and prominent a feature of the shores of our country to its citizens returning from Europe, that the State of New Jersey, upon an application made by the United States Government in 1880, through its governor, then Gen. George B. McClellan, granted the rights to the United States Government, which accepted the same, thus putting the stamp of approval or confirmation upon the title of New Jersey to these lands under water as paramount to that of the proprietors.

"It will be noticed that the procedure for the United States to follow in acquiring lands of the State for lighthouse purposes is different to that of the Government or an individual in acquiring lands of the State for commercial uses. In the latter case application is made directly to the riparian commission, who pass upon the same, subject to the approval of the governor. It would be interesting to know what was in the minds of the legislature of 1875, when this act was passed.

"And further, in confirmation of this attitude or acceptance by the United States Government of the paramount title of the State of New Jersey to lands flowed by tidewater at mean high tide, it is interesting to note that in 1901 an application was made by parties interested in the exploitation of a scheme of development of certain lands under water lying about midway between Ellis and Bedloes Islands, in New York Bay, asking the State of New Jersey for a grant of the State's title to these lands. The State of New Jersey applied to the War Department for approval of the lines defining this development.

"The War Department declined to approve such lines on the ground that the rights and necessities of commerce would not permit of the construction in question, and adding that the United States Government, owning Bedloe and Ellis Islands, and using them for national purposes, were entitled to whatever rights and privileges belonged to riparian owners in the lands under water around and between these islands, and stating that it was not only possible, but probable that, in the near future, the United States might wish to use these lands for public purposes. This seemed like an intimation on the part of the Government of ownership or control; whereupon, the riparian commission inquired of the Secretary of War—

"Whether the Federal authorities claimed ownership in the lands under water in New York Bay, surrounding Ellis and Bedloe Islands, so that they may appropriate the same to the uses of the United States Government without making application therefor to the State of New Jersey.

"The answer of the Government, through the Secretary of War, is as follows:

"In reply I beg to state that the action of the Secretary of War, which was communicated to the riparian commission of New Jersey, was simply the modification of the harbor lines around Ellis Island, by extending the pier and bulkhead lines in accordance with the request of the Secretary of the Treasury. This action was no assertion of title of ownership in the lands under water, but simply a regulation of its use with regard to the navigable waterway and the interests of commerce.

"An interesting instance of the exercise of the claim of the proprietors to lands flowed by tidewater, came under the notice of the State authorities some few years ago, when two gentle and amiable ministers of the Gospel, hailing from that city noted for gentle and amiable citizens, appeared with a petition for the right to occupy part of an island in the lower tidal waters of the State; and the language of the petition is so unworldly, it may be of interest to quote it:

PETITION TO PURCHASE A CERTAIN MARSH ISLAND WEST OF HOLLY BEACH INLET, CAPE MAY COUNTY, STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

"To the honorable the riparian commission of the State of New Jersey:

"The petition respectfully represents—

"1. That your said petitioners are citizens of the United States and of the State of Pennsylvania, residing in the city and county of Philadelphia.

"2. That in March of the year 1902 while spending some time at Holly Beach, in the county of Cape May, State of New Jersey, noticing with favor a portion of unoccupied marsh island bordering the west edge of the first main channel west of Holly Beach, across which said island the county bridge from Holly Beach to Rio Grande (now completed), was then building, they, the said petitioners, did stake off and apportion to themselves on the aforesaid marsh island, portions of the same for the purpose of erecting thereon summer cottages for the use of themselves and families.

"3. That your said petitioners, pursuant to their first intention, have erected on the said portions of the said marsh island cottages as aforesaid, and also have interested other persons to do the same.

"4. That the said petitioners have rendered the said portion of marsh island accessible and desirable for occupation by certain improvements, the cost of which they have borne, among which is a substantial footwalk bridge 250 feet or more in length.

"5. That the said petitioners having been the pioneers and originators of this colony, desire to secure the said marsh island for settlement by respectable settlers, and for the protection of those persons already settled thereon, and to that end have had the said marsh island surveyed, a plan of which survey, together with a description of the same, is hereunto affixed and marked with the letter 'A,' and made part of this petition.

"6. That the said marsh island is not improved land of the State, nor is it included within any lands designated for improvement, but it is wholly covered by from 2 to 3 feet of salt water every ordinary tide, and is a mud flat covered with sedge grass at low tide.

"7. That your petitioners desire your honorable commission to fix such reasonable and just price as may be deemed proper for said marsh island, upon payment of which by your petitioners a clear and defeasible title thereto may be granted them.

"8. That your petitioners desire your honorable commission to fix a time and place when and where they may appear and be heard regarding this petition for purchase, and such other privileges as your honorable commission may deem fitting.

"And your petitioners will ever pray, etc.

"It just happened that at the time the newspaper men were devoting some attention to this department of the State. Anyone who has had experience with the young gentlemen who write up the daily news knows what an energetic and enterprising lot of young men they are; how cleverly, out of little, they can build an ornamental and attractive structure.

"The newspaper men got hold of this unique case, and in the papers appeared such head lines as these:

"Baptist ministers seize a New Jersey island—They noticed it with favor and so they simply swiped it—Will trust in God and Senator Hand," etc.—

"and wrote the matter up in the following facetious way, which cleverly contained very much of truth:

"Each one of the four riparian commissioners of this State at their meeting this morning sat bolt upright in his chair and gasped in utter astonishment as two Philadelphia Baptist ministers, with much washing of hands with invisible soap and unctuous tones, gently preferred the modest request that the board should give them the title to an island in Cape May County, which the reverend gentlemen had, as they felicitously termed it, 'noticed with favor,' and quietly preempted it, without so much as by your leave gentleman of the State of New Jersey.

"'Eh?' said the chairman.

"'What?' ejaculated the board's counsel, horrified.

"'Bless me!' exclaimed another commissioner.

"'Dangerous precedent,' observed the secretary, 'for instance, if some one should notice with favor my house, what then?'

"To make matters all the more complicated behind the ministers sat Senator Robert E. Hand, of Cape May County, who had before the board an application for the very identical island, too. Genial Bob, quietly enjoying a 'chaw,' listened blandly to the ministers' arguments and regarded the entire proceedings as a huge joke. His application was in first, and since truth must be told, Bob, to use a well-known metaphor, had neatly euchred the ministers. Bit by bit the commissioners were put in possession of the facts of a very singular case, the beginning of which is best told in the ministers' own refreshing language, as set forth above.

"So like the Israelites of old, these Philadelphia ministerial pioneers found a promised land, and they rushed back to their kith and kin in far away sleepy Philadelphia and conveyed to them the glad tidings. They engaged the services of Robert E. Hand, a guileless dock builder, oyster planter, general contractor, and everything else in Cape May, to set the pilings for the cottages. Bob was only too delighted, and very soon there was a small colony of the elect of Philadelphia on stilts. But Bob, like Dickens's famous character, Joey B., 'was sly, devilish sly,' and when he found that the worthy colonists had no title to their land, he resolved to put that right by asking one in his own name, doubtlessly for the purpose afterwards of making the ministers a present of it.

"While this was being done, the secretary had everything not screwed down in the offices, which might be 'noticed with favor' removed to an inner room." (This was the facetia of the newspapers.)

"The fact in the case was that the east Jersey proprietors had made a grant to one of the parties, although, as stated in the petition, 'the Marsh Island is wholly covered by from 2 to 3 feet of salt water at every ordinary tide.' The conclusion of this matter was that the grant by the proprietors was ignored by the State, and these amiable ministers, who were most admirable gentlemen, were confirmed by the State in their title to the little Venice they had 'noticed with favor.'

STATE BOUNDARY LINE.

"Reference was made to a survey or grant by the proprietors in 1746 of Bedloes Island, in Hudson County, to Kennedy. Apprehending it may be questioned by some that Bedloes Island was and is in Hudson County, a brief history of the determination and location of the boundary line between New Jersey and New York will be of interest:

"The exact definition of the boundary line between New York and New Jersey seems not to have interested the earlier inhabitants of these two States, and so apparently unimportant an incident or industry as that of gathering oysters and other shellfish from the waters of Raritan Bay is responsible for the determination and finally the actual location of this boundary line.

"The value of lands under water in Raritan Bay was recognized early in the last century. Raritan Bay is a shallow, land-locked body of water, subject to the ebb and flow of ocean tides and fed by many fresh water streams, possessing every requisite necessary for the successful and profitable cultivation of shellfish.

"Beds of natural growth, where oysters and clams grew in great abundance, were found by the early settlers, and for a long time these proved sufficient to supply the wants of the scanty population. The rapid growth of population and the apparent danger of depletion from overfishing soon rendered artificial propagation necessary, and about the year 1810, the first oysters were planted and cultivated in Raritan Bay.

"At first all the land under water in Raritan Bay was considered as common to the residents of both States, and no attempt was made to divide them according to State lines, and not until the industry began to grow in importance, and the land consequently to increase in value, did local jealousies and disputes arise between the citizens of New York and New Jersey.

"These disputes soon grew to be of a serious nature, and sometimes ended in bloodshed. * * * Especially was this so after the legislature of each State had made it a misdemeanor for citizens to take or cultivate oysters in the waters of the other State, and in 1834 a treaty or compact was entered into by the two States in which it was agreed that 'the boundary line between the States of New York and New Jersey shall be the middle of the Hudson River, of the Bay of New York, of the water between Staten Island and New Jersey and of Raritan Bay to the main sea.' This agreement was entered into on September 16, 1833, and confirmed by the Legislature of New York February 5, 1834; by the Legislature of New Jersey February 26, 1834; and approved by the Congress of the United States June 28, 1834. This, though vague, was sufficiently definite for a long time, but the rapidly increasing number of planters and the great demand for oyster lands soon led to the occupation of the lands in the most valuable part of the bay. The indefinite nature of the description of the boundary line given in the agreement of 1834 became a source of constant dispute, and in 1886, pursuant to a joint resolution of the legislature, Gov. Green appointed Robert C. Bacot, A. B. Stoney, and George H. Cook a commission on the part of New Jersey to cooperate with a similar commission on the part of the State of New York to locate and mark out in Raritan Bay the line of 1834. The commission concluded its work and made its report to the governor on December 20, 1887.

"The work of this commission was so satisfactory that it was continued to definitely locate and mark out the boundary between the States in Staten Island Sound, Kill von Kull, New York Bay, and the Hudson River. It was in the latter part of this commission work that the Hon. Robert C. Bacot, who was chairman of the commission on the part of New Jersey, as well as the engineer of the riparian commission, clung so tenaciously and successfully to the contention that the treaty of 1834 fixed the middle of the channel of New York Bay, and not the middle of the area of the waters of the bay, as the boundary line, as contended for by the New York State commissioners. This resulted in giving to the State of New Jersey not only a greater area of land under water, but in fixing the boundary line in the center of the deep-water channel, and placing Ellis and Bedloe's Islands, as well as Oyster and Robbins Reef, within the State of New Jersey and in Hudson County.

"A curious and amusing incident occurred off the shores of Greenville about the year 1875:

"The State of New Jersey had made a grant of lands under water in New York Bay, opposite the shores of Greenville, the grant extending some 3,000 feet into the waters of the bay. The grantees had proceeded to bulkhead the outer end of this tract and to fill it in with refuse from the city of New York. This in time came to be a great nuisance, as the malodors arising from the effect of the summer sun were wafted by the prevailing southeasterly breezes of summer to the then bucolic residents of the sylvan shores of Greenville. They protested, but the protests were not loud enough to reach over the intervening half a mile of water from their shores to the offending filling. And so the aid of the law was invoked for relief, and the late Charles H. Winfield, that eloquent practitioner of the law, was employed to secure, through the courts, relief for our citizens.

"In the trial of the case the defense was set up by the offending parties, under that ancient and exploded theory that the city of New York controlled the waters of the Bay of New York to the New Jersey shore, and disregarding also the fact that they had accepted the title and paid the State of New Jersey for the lands in question, that the Greenvillians were not entitled to any relief, as the offense they complained of was within the jurisdiction of New York and not of New Jersey.

"Mr. Winfield, resourceful in repartee, as well as in law, replied to the court, with convincing effect, that leaving out the question whether the locus of the filling was in New York or New Jersey, there was no question that the odors were in New Jersey, and that they were indicting the odors and demanded relief. The court took that view of it and afforded the relief asked for.

"The examination and care of the monuments marking the boundary line of the State is one of the many duties devolving upon the riparian commission of the State. By act of April 4, 1891 (P. L., 1891, p. 324), the riparian commission is authorized and directed to cause an examination of the monuments and to report to the legislature their condition, and to make necessary repairs, etc.

STATE CONTROL OF ITS RIPARIAN LANDS.

"No particular supervision or control seems to have been exercised by the State over its lands under water until 1851, when the legislature passed what is known as the wharf act, to which I shall refer later, entitled 'An act to authorize the owners of lands upon tidewaters to build wharves in front of the same.' (P. L., 1851, p. 335.)

"It appears, however, that since the beginning of the nineteenth century the legislature of the State of New Jersey has from time to time made grants, the more important of which were located under the waters of the Hudson River and New York Bay.

"In 1802 a conditional grant of 2 acres was made to Nathaniel Budd, which was a small part of the grant by the proprietors to Elisha Boudinot in 1803. (This grant by the proprietors covered about 53½ acres of land under water, and lay between Fourth and Twelfth Streets in Jersey City, Pavonia Avenue running about through the center of it.)

"In 1804 a grant was made to the associates of the Jersey Co., covering practically the land under water in front of the southern part of old Jersey City. A map in a good state of preservation is still in existence, showing the Hudson River water front from Harsimus or First Street south to South Street or the Morris Canal Basin. It is a map advertising the sale of this property, and has an interesting engraving of the water front of Jersey City, showing the old Pennsylvania station and ferry slips, the Cunard docks, with the single smokestack, side-wheel steamers, partly square rigged as sailing vessels, and also, approaching the slip, an old-fashioned walking-beam ferryboat, with the name D. S. Gregory on the paddle box.

"In the background appears the roof and spire of the old Washington Street Presbyterian Church, of which, within the memory of many still living, Dr. Imbrie was the pastor.

"This church enjoyed the unique distinction of having been transported piecemeal from where it originally stood on Wall Street, New York City, across the river and reerected in substantially its original form. It stood on the east side of Washington Street, adjoining the park on its southerly side and nearly opposite the Gregory homestead. One of the Gregory boys was the organist in the church, and the writer of this paper, when a young man, sang in the choir. It was out of no disrespect to the amiable and able pastor, Dr. Imbrie, that at the beginning of the sermon on warm summer mornings a part of the choir would silently steal down the stairs from the organ loft and seat themselves under the peaceful shade of the trees in the park, hearing, if not listening to, the voice of the earnest old doctor, as it came through the windows until warned by its cessation that the time had come to resume their places and part in the service.

"This church was subsequently torn down and apartment houses erected on its site.

"The legend on the map in question reads as follows:

"David Scott, auctioneer. Map of valuable property in Jersey City, belonging to the associates of the Jersey Co. and others. Sixty lots in blocks C to I, fronting on and extended 150 feet east from Hudson Street, will be sold at public auction in Jersey City on Wednesday the 24th June, 1857, at 2 o'clock p. m.

"The side-wheel, square rigged, ocean steamships shown in the engraving of 1857 are interestingly foreshadowed in the following act of the Legislature of New Jersey, passed in 1848 (P. L., 1848, p. 256), as follows:

"Relative to the pilot laws of the United States.

"1. Be it resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That the passage of the act of March 2, 1837, by Congress, by which the business of pilotage in the bays and harbors adjoining this State and the State of New York was thrown open to citizens of this State appointed as pilots under our laws was an act of justice to the State of New Jersey and loudly called for by the appalling disasters upon our coasts, which before that time continued to occur in quick succession.

"2. And be it resolved, That the results of the experience of the last 10 years, the greatly diminished number of wrecks of vessels approaching our shores, the superior vigilance and care of the New Jersey pilots, the danger of a renewal of the melancholy scenes and loss of life which attended the wrecks of the Mexico and Bristol, the impolicy and injustice of again erecting a monopoly, encouraging criminal remissness on the part of the pilots, all combine to furnish an unanswerable argument against the repeal of the present law.

"3. And be it resolved, That the recent establishment of a line of ocean steamships from Great Britain, whose terminus is at the port of Jersey City, furnishes an additional argument against the repeal of that act.

"4. And be it resolved, That the governor of this State be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

"Approved February 11, 1848.

"In 1836 the State made a grant to Nathaniel Budd of the entire 53½ acres lying on the Hudson River between Fourth and Twelfth Streets in Jersey City, practically the same tract granted by the proprietors to Boudinot in 1803.

"In 1838 the State made a grant to the Hoboken Land & Improvement Co. practically covering all the land under water in front of Hoboken.

"In 1848 the State made a grant to Stephen Vreeland covering land under water adjacent to Caven Point.

"In 1849 a grant was made to Ingham & Jenkins covering lands under water at Bergen Point.

"In 1869 a grant was made to the United New Jersey Railroad and Canal Cos., which is known as the Pennsylvania Railroad, of lands under water in front of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.'s property.

"After March 31, 1869, the control and administration of the riparian interests of the State was placed in the hands of commissioners appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Senate.

THE WHARF ACT.

"In 1851 the authorities of the State seem to have recognized the necessity of placing the supervision and control of the construction of wharves or docks in the hands of the local authorities affected by these improvements, and on March 18, 1851 (P. L. 1851, p. 335), the legislature passed what is known as the wharf act.

"This act gave the shore owner the authority to build docks or wharves in front of his lands and outlined the necessary procedure to be followed in obtaining the right to do so. It set forth that any owner of lands situated on tidewaters who might desire to build a dock or wharf to extend beyond the limits of ordinary low water should first obtain a license for that purpose from the board of chosen freeholders of the county in which the lands might lie; it provided that applications should be advertised in a newspaper published in the county, and, as throwing a little light on the advance we have made, provided that in the event of a county in which no newspaper was published that the notice might be published in the paper of an adjoining county. This notice was to be published for six weeks and was to be put up in five of the most public places in the neighborhood of the lands in question, and the notice was to specify the location and dimensions of the dock or wharf intended to be built. The freeholders, upon proof of these formalities having been complied with, were to make an examination and if, in their judgment, the improvement did not appear to be injurious to public navigation, and after giving opportunity to those opposed to be heard, granted the license sought.

"This license was to specify the limits of the improvement, be recorded in the minutes of the freeholders, and recorded in the clerk's office of the county.

"It was also provided that the dock in question should be built within five years of the time of issuing said license and that the rights to the same should thereafter be vested in the shore owner, and contained an interesting provision that it should not be assignable, except with and as pertaining to the land in front of which it was constructed, and that it should pass by any sale of said lands as appurtenant to the same, thus clearly being a recognition of the inherent right in the shore owner to the uses and advantages of the waterway.

"It was also provided that in case of an owner situated on tidewater, which was a boundary line between two counties, practically the same procedure should be gone through with by the freeholders of both counties.

"There were other provisions which are more in the nature of details and not interesting in this connection.

"It is of interest, however, to note that the legislature in 1851 defined the terms used in the act, and the eleventh section is as follows:

"And be it enacted, That the term 'shore' in this act shall be construed to mean the land between the limits of ordinary high and low water; the term 'shore line' to mean the edge of the water at ordinary high water; and the term 'shore owner' to mean the owner of the lands above and adjoining the shore line.

"This act applied to the entire State, of course, and numerous docks were built under it, perhaps a greater number in Essex, Hudson, and Union Counties than in any other riparian counties of the State.

"No compensation to the State appears to have been provided for in the act, and what the expenses were to these shore owners in acquiring their licenses is a matter known only to the parties interested. There was much good-natured gossip on this question; without doubt the committee of the freeholders appointed to examine the locality of the dock applied for was hospitably treated by the applicant. There is no reason to doubt that the applicant provided glasses through which a view, favorable to his application, might be obtained by the freeholders, and, as was the custom in those days of few hotels and less expeditious means of travel, the comfort of the visiting freeholders was looked after as a matter of kindly hospitality, if nothing else.

"A former governor of this State upon applying as counsel for the full right of the State to land on which existed a dock built under one of these freeholders' licenses was asked by the State representatives if he knew what the license the owner had obtained from the freeholder had cost him. The ex-governor, who was known for his genial nature, smiled in a reminiscent way, shaking his head, and said he could not tell.

"In 1869 the supplement to the act of 1864, creating the riparian commission, was passed, and the wharf act of 1851 was repealed so far as it applied to the waters of the Hudson River, New York Bay, and Kill von Kull (to Enyards Dock on the Kill von Kull), Enyards Dock being about at the foot of Ingham Avenue and Bayonne.

"Attempts were made thereafter to continue the work of construction under freeholders' licenses, but the State objected and commenced suit to prevent this being done and was successful in its endeavors.

"The freeholders continued to have authority to grant licenses in the rest of the riparian counties of the State until July 1, 1891, but on March 20, 1891, an act was passed repealing the wharf act as to the entire State, provision being made in such repeal that the freeholders might continue to exercise their authority under the act of 1851 until July 1, 1891, and the further condition that any reclamation authorized under such licenses should be completed before January 1, 1892. So that, notice being served on the shore owners by the act of March 20, 1891, that the wharf act was to go out of use on July 1, 1891, a great rush was made in the intervening three months, particularly in Hudson, Union, and Middlesex Counties, to secure these licenses, and there being but six months between July 1, 1891, and January 1, 1892, within which to complete any structures authorized, expedients were resorted to in an attempt to comply with the provisions of the wharf act of 1851, and the holders of these licenses hastened to make reclamation of the lands under water, so as to come within the provisions of the act. These improvements consisted, in many instances, and in most instances, of simply placing piles or monuments at intervals along the land covered by their respective licenses. In many instances these piles were strung along, covering spaces of from 100 to 3,000 feet. In some instances some form of construction was attempted, such as piles connected by a stringpiece; in others a double row of piling had been driven, capped, and planked.

"Neither this form of construction nor the method of obtaining the licenses conformed with the requirements of the act of 1851, and a case was brought to issue in 1894 to test the questions involved.

"A landowner in 1891 had secured one of these licenses from the freeholders and had driven a line of piling, as above described, and then sold the land with this license and this construction attached. The purchaser then proceeded to build a substantial and usable dock under color of title by this license and reclamation. The State thereupon, through the attorney general, filed an information to compel the removal of the dock erected by the owner as an encroachment upon lands of the State. After a careful presentation of the case on the part of the State and of the landowner, the court decreed that the land in question was located on lands of the State, without the authority of the State, and was therefore decreed to be a purpresture upon the lands of the State, and that the landowner should cause the removal of the same; also, that the landowner should pay the costs of suit. This case is that of The State, Attorney General, informant, v. The American Lucol Co.

"This finally disposed of the question, both of the right of the freeholders to grant licenses and the character of the improvements to be made under the same, and although the right to the use and continuance of a specific dock, properly built under freeholders' license is not questioned, it is not the title of the State, and when conveyance of shore-front property is now made the full title of the State is sought.

"In 1864 (P. L., 1864, p. 781) the legislature appointed a commission to look into the subject of the riparian rights of the State, and in 1865 this commission made a report. In 1869 (P. L., 1869, p. 1017) the act was passed creating the riparian commission and repealing the wharf act as to the Hudson River, New York Bay, and Kill van Kull. In 1891 (P. L., 1891, p. 216) the wharf act was repealed as to the rest of the tidal waters of the State, and thereafter the riparian commission was the only source through which riparian grants were made.

"The fact of the absolute ownership of the State in these lands under water was not acquiesced in by all of the legal authorities.

"In 1864, when the legislature was questioning the more methodical administration of these lands, the opinion of legal authorities was sought as to the rights of the State; and while most of the authorities agreed that the State's title was absolute, Hon. F. T. Frelinghuysen, attorney general of the State, in an opinion given to the senate on the question as to whether the State had a right to dispose of the lands under water adjoining the shore to other than riparian owners, after careful reasoning and citing of cases, concludes:

"That the State can not authorize another than the riparian owner to interpose between him and tidewater and can not take the shore between high and low water mark for public use without giving compensation.

"The present rule and practice is that the State may consider the application of a nonriparian owner after the riparian owner has had six months' time within which to make the application himself; but the act of March 31, 1869, provides that a grantee who is not the owner of the ripa—

"shall not fill up or improve said lands under water until the rights and interest of the riparian owner in said lands under water (if any he has) shall be extinguished—

"and this is followed by the method of procedure to conserve his rights.

"The act of March 20, 1891, however, provides that the owner of the ripa shall have six months' notice of the application of a nonriparian owner, but makes no mention of the 'rights and interest (if any he has)' in the lands under water applied for.

"It would seem as though the owner of lands fronting or bounding on a tidal stream had some rights of access to and use of the water, which he could not be deprived of without due process and compensation. Gov. Marcus L. Ward, on April 11, 1864 (Legal Documents, 1867, p. 25), in filing, without his approval, a bill granting certain lands under water in the 'South Cove' to Mathiessen & Wiechers Sugar Refining Co., on the ground that the company were not the owners of the ripa, used the following language:

"It appears to me that the owners of lands adjacent to tidewaters have a better right to those waters for certain purposes than other citizens of the Nation. It would create consternation among the owners of such lands through (sic) the State to learn that no respect whatever was to be paid to the advantages derived from their adjacency to tidewater.

"This inherent right in the upland or shore owner is recognized by the State of Pennsylvania: By act approved June 8, 1907, a 'board of commissioners of navigation for the River Delaware and its navigable tributaries' was established, and the law and practice of the State is expressed by the board as follows:

"It has never been the practice in Pennsylvania to distinguish riparian rights from other rights connected with the land; owning to the water line, the owner has the use of the water, just as the owner of land abutting on a street has the use of a street.

"The contrary view seems to be supported by a decision of the court of errors and appeals in this State in the case of Stevens v. The Paterson & Newark Railroad Co. (5 Vroom, 532), but a writer in a report to the Legislature of New Jersey, in 1883, furnishes the following interesting statement of fact and citation of cases in relation to the ground for this decision:

"We desire it understood that we should not assume to sit in review upon any decision of that court if we conceived that the court itself would still adhere to the decision then made, but the circumstances are such as to lead to the inevitable conclusion that the court which decided the Stevens case would overrule that decision were the opportunity to present itself. That case was decided in the year 1870, and the point was determined upon legal authorities cited by the learned chief justice who delivered the majority opinion. Reference was made to the case of Gould v. Hudson River Railroad Co. (N. Y.) (2 Seld., 522), and so far as the court was controlled by the American decisions it is safe to say that it made the case of Gould a leading authority. But it is perfectly clear that the court sought to ascertain and determined to declare in favor of the English rule of law upon the point as to the right of the shore owner. In ascertaining the rule of law upon that point as applied by the English courts our courts cited and mainly relied upon the case of Buccleuch v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, decided by the English Court of Exchequer, the decision of which came to hand while our court was considering of its decision in the Stevens case. That decision of the exchequer court was adverse to the right of the shore owner, and being then unreversed, was treated by our court as properly stating the English rule of law upon that point; and upon this the Stevens case was decided adversely to the right of the shore owner. Chancellor Zabriskie, who took part, however, rendered a very elaborate dissenting opinion, in which he held that the riparian proprietor had a right to the natural privileges conferred on his land of which he could not be deprived even by the State without due compensation.

"After the decision of the Stevens case by our court upon the strength of the case of Buccleuch v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, as determined in the court of exchequer, an appeal was taken in the latter case to the House of Lords, and after elaborate argument the decision of the exchequer court was on April 30, 1872, reversed and the right of the shore owner established by the highest court of England. (Law Repts. 5 (House of Lords), 418.) It may be well for us to see just what the House of Lords there decided. The case arose as follows: The Duke of Buccleuch was the owner of a lease and in possession of Montagu House, which had an ornamental garden in its rear which adjoined the River Thames, and the natural flow of the water at high tide brought it up to his garden wall—the frontage of the garden on the river was 145 feet. The metropolitan board of works, under authority of Parliament, constructed an embankment along the River Thames which cut off the flow of the water to the Duke's garden. We now cite some of the propositions stated by the judges in the House of Lords:

"'The Duke was entitled as riparian owner to the regular flow of the water all along the extremity of his garden. * * * Now, the deprivation of the water right is clearly an injurious affecting of the premises to which it is annexed within the proper meaning of the term.

"'No doubt has been entertained by any of the judges who have had to consider this case that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation in respect to the taking of his causeway and the consequent injury to his property by depriving it of the direct access which that afforded to the Thames. * * * The plaintiff, as owner of land abutting on a navigable river, was entitled to a right of access to the stream along his whole frontage, and not merely at the spot where his jetty projected. * * * The Duke had the land constituting the residence Montagu House, with the courtyard, offices, and garden attached, and had annexed and appurtenant to it the jetty or landing place, and although he had not the bed of the river, he had the easement or right or privilege, by whatever name it may be called, of the flow of the River Thames in its natural channel up to his garden wall. He had one entire thing. He had not the land alone, or the jetty alone, or the right of the flow of the water of the river alone; he had all combined together; and if anyone had done an act injurious to the land or the jetty or to the right to the flow of the water, he would have had a legal right of action against him. If the owner of the soil of the bed of the river or anyone else had constructed an embankment and roadway upon the jetty or landing place, so as to shut out the Duke's premises from the river, he could have maintained an action against him for two causes: First, for destroying his jetty; secondly, for depriving him of his riparian right. * * * The property of the plaintiff in error in this case was what is commonly called riparian property. The meaning of that is that it had a water frontage. The meaning of its having a water frontage was this, that it had a right to the undisturbed flow of the river, which passed along the whole frontage of the property in the form in which it had been formerly accustomed to pass. That being the state of things, this water frontage, with these rights which the plaintiff in error possessed, were taken for the purposes of the act. Beyond all doubt the water right was a property belonging to the plaintiff, for which compensation was to be made.'

"And the writer goes on to cite other English cases to the same effect, and states that the American rule as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States is in full accord with the principles laid down in the English cases cited, following this assertion with references to a great number of adjudicated cases, and concludes as follows: The conclusion is that these decisions of the highest tribunals, both in England and in this country, have wholly subverted the rule laid down in the Stevens case, and affirmed that the shore owner has such a vested right to have the water flow to his ripa as he can not be divested of by the State without the exercise of eminent domain.

"I am bound to admit, however, that the decision in the case of the Mayor and Council of the City of Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co. (124 U. S., p. 656) is rather disconcerting to this view. The syllabus in this case holds generally that:

"The act of March 31, 1869, is not objectionable under the State constitution on account of its title, that the interest of the State in the riparian lands is a distinct and separate estate, and that a State's grantee holds the exclusive title against the adverse claim of right of way by a municipality by virtue of an original dedication to high-water mark.

"Although there have been cases in New Jersey where application has been made to the State by a nonriparian owner, the question of the equity of the riparian owner has never been passed on by the riparian commission, for the reason that in some of these cases the application has been made with the consent of the riparian owner, and in others the riparian owner has, before the expiration of the six months, availed himself of his right and presented his own application, so that the question of the rights or equity of the shore owner has not arisen.

"Hon. Abraham Browning, Cortland Parker, and George M. Robeson agreed practically that the State had the right to dispose of these lands under water without regard to the owner of the upland in front of which they were situated; and yet, running through the reasoning and decision of all these men is a recognition that up to 1851 the shore owner, under what was called the 'common law,' had certain courtesies or rights, and these rights have been recognized in the decisions of the courts to the extent that any reclamation of lands under water between high and low water line, made previous to the year 1869, vested the title to such lands in the riparian owner.

"This custom or principle was affirmed in the great case of the Trustees of the School Fund and the Lehigh Valley Railroad v. The Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey, in the following manner:

"About the year 1863 the Central Railroad Co. bought the fringe of the shore, or a strip 3 feet in width, all the way from about where the old abattoir stood on the shore at Lafayette around, to, and across the mouth of Mill Creek, to about Warren Street in Jersey City, and under this ownership, as well as under a claim of right through its charter, proceeded to construct, by building on a trestle, a railroad, which is still the line of the Central Railroad, to the Central Railroad Ferry, and also proceeded to fill in a considerable part of what is known as the South Cove or Communipaw Bay.

"In 1865 the commission appointed to examine into the subject of riparian rights and to submit maps submitted a map showing certain basins and lines for improvements in these same waters. The Central Railroad Co., disregarding these lines, proceeded with improvements and developed and filled in large areas.

"In 1872 the riparian commission, by direction of the legislature, granted to the New Jersey West Line Railroad Co., to whose title and charter the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. had succeeded, a block of land some 500 feet in width by about 4,000 feet in length, running through the heart or axis of the lands under water afterwards granted to the Central Railroad Co., about one-half the area of which had been, up to that time, bulkheaded and filled in by the Central Railroad Co.

"Now this block of land, 500 feet wide by 4,000 feet long, was in front of upland to which the New Jersey West Line Railroad Co. neither had, nor claimed to have, any title, but was granted on the assumption that the State was the absolute owner of its lands under water, and without the courtesy of the six months' notice provided for in the act of 1869; but I have an impression that the rights or claims of the Van Horne family, who owned most of the upland in front of which this land under water lay, were satisfied or quieted.

"The Central Railroad Co., which had been requested and pressed by the State authorities to either desist from filling in these lands under water or to apply to the State for a proper grant for the same, did apply in 1874, and a grant was made in that year to the Central Railroad Co. for $300,000, of all the lands under water in Communipaw Cove and New York Bay, as well as in some other waters of minor importance, in front of upland owned by the company, with the exception of the land granted to the New Jersey West Line Railroad Co. and some others not germane to this phase of the question.

"No attempt was made by the New Jersey West Line Railroad Co. to occupy or use the land and land under water granted by the State in 1872; but the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., having succeeded to the rights of the New Jersey West Line Railroad Co., with the cooperation of the trustees for the support of public schools, who were interested in the question, proceeded, by suit in ejectment, to establish its title to the land in question, and succeeded in this suit as to the entire area covered by the grant, with the exception of a very small portion lying between the original high-water line, which had been filled in by the Central Railroad Co. previous to the year 1869; thus affirming, in a case of stupendous importance and financial magnitude, the principle above set down that previous to 1869 reclamations made between the high and low water line became the property of the adjacent shore owner, and also that the State was the absolute owner of the lands under water and could, with the possible limitations above suggested, convey the same to anyone, regardless of the shore or upland owner.

"There is an idea or an impression prevalent, even among lawyers, that adverse possession does not operate or run against the State; that is to say, that the rule that ordinarily applies to an individual having had adverse possession of lands for the period of 20 years, vests title to the same in such possessor, does not apply to the State of New Jersey. This is, however, not true.

"A general statute of the State of New Jersey, which will be found in No. 2 of the revision, page 1978, section 27, provides:

"That no person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, shall be sued or impleaded by the State of New Jersey for any lands, tenements or hereditaments, or for any rents, revenues, issues, or profits thereof, but within 20 years after the right, title, or cause of action to the same accrue, and not after.

"But this fact, while it would no doubt vest title in lands filled in below high-water line, if the State did not assert its title within 20 years of the time the encroachment was made, the rights of the State to the lands under water in front of the same would not in any way be impaired or changed.

"So that the practice, founded on law and subsequent legislation and decisions of the court is, that a person owning land fronting on the navigable water at mean high tide is entitled to apply to the properly constituted agent of the State for title to the lands under water out to such line or lines for improvements as may be fixed by the State through these agents, and thereafter to attach all the rights and emoluments incident to the navigable waters in question, such as the right to fill in and build upon and exercise the ordinary property rights as well as to collect wharfage and such rights as are incident to navigation.

"The practical application of these doctrines and of the administration of these interests of the State is that the commission or authority having it in charge make an examination of the waters under contemplation and decide where the line for solid filling and the line for piers may be placed, which shall at once make the shore attractive and useful for commercial development and convenient of approach by vessels, and at the same time conserve and not encroach upon or interfere with the general navigation by the public of the waters in question.

"Upon receipt of an application for such water rights by the owner of the shore or ripa (and in the case of a nonriparian owner the proceeding is only delayed six months), the commission having previously fixed the lines above referred to and filed a map showing the same, in the office of the secretary of state, proceeds to acquaint itself with the value of the lands in question, or rather, to fix such a price as will adequately compensate the State for its equity in these lands, at the same time seeking not to embarrass or discourage the location of commercial industries or enterprises desiring the rights.

"When this price has been fixed and agreed to by the applicant, the question of his title is submitted to the legal advisor of the board and upon approval of the same a description and formal grant conveying the rights of the State is prepared, is signed by the commissioners, is submitted to the governor for his consideration and signature, if approved, has then the State seal attached and attested by the secretary of state, and is then ready for delivery upon receipt of the consideration. This consideration, when received, is paid into the State treasury, and is then invested and the proceeds devoted to the support of free public schools.

"A number of interesting questions arise in the administration of this trust, which, while perhaps of particular interest to the legal profession, are of interest to every thoughtful mind, as a part of the administration of the great water front of our county and State.

"The question as to the location and direction the lines of these lands under water shall take is an interesting one; what is known as the Massachusetts rule has been generally followed in this particular, and, briefly stated, it is that where a shore line is continuously straight, or practically so, for any considerable distance, the lines of the lands under water are said to run at right angles to this shore line, and the only limitation to this principle is, how much of the shore shall be considered in the application of this rule.

"In the practice in our own tidewaters, before the creation of the riparian commission, a shore owner at Edgewater, in Bergen County, in 1866, procured from the freeholders under the wharf act of 1851, a license to build a dock, and the description in this license illustrates one of the phases of this branch of the subject.

"The license in question was issued under the act of 1851, and the description is as follows:

"License to build such dock, wharf, or pier in front of his said lands, in the township of Hackensack, in the county of Bergen, beyond the limits of ordinary low-water mark in Hudson River:

"Beginning at the northeasterly corner of the lands owned by the licensee, where the northerly boundary line of said land terminates at law-water mark on said river"—you will note the presumption is that the licensee already had the right to go out to low-water mark—"and running thence easterly and perpendicular to the stream or currents of said river about 500 feet"—it is not difficult to apprehend the confusion that would arise from making all of the grants along an ordinary river perpendicular to the stream or currents of the same—"thence southerly along and parallel with said stream or current about 100 feet; thence westerly on a line perpendicular to said stream or current about 500 feet to low-water mark; thence along low-water mark northerly 100 feet to the place of beginning.

"And this license is signed by G. G. Ackerman, director, and witnessed by M. M. Wygant, clerk, and is proved by the said clerk before Manning M. Knapp, master in chancery, March 12, 1866.

"But when the riparian commission, in 1869, fixed exterior lines for solid filling and piers, they took in a much longer section of shore front than that contemplated by the freeholders, and the consequence was that the line for solid filling fixed for the section considered by the riparian commissioners, was not parallel to the smaller section previously considered by the freeholders, and a line at right angles to the line fixed by the commission was not parallel to or coincident with the line fixed by the freeholders for the license in question.

"The licensee in this case, after 1869, when the wharf act was repealed as to the Hudson River, continued the work of constructing this dock for which he had the license in 1866, and was stopped by the State of New Jersey on the ground that his rights had expired or had become forefeited under the repeal of the act, and he was obliged to take out the rights to continue his work from the State, which he did in 1875, and when this grant was made by the State, through its riparian commissioners, it was made on the broader principle of lines perpendicular to an exterior line that should parallel a greater extent of shore front than that contemplated by the freeholders in 1865; the result being that a section of land under water in the form of a trapezoid was left ungranted by the State, and was afterwards added to the grant made in 1875.

"Again, the Massachusetts rule provides that where there is a pronounced cove, with jutting capes on either end, causing a less frontage on the exterior line than on the shore, it becomes necessary to apportion the frontage on the exterior line proportionally to the frontage on the shore; and a pronounced example of this condition is the New York Bay shore between Caven Point and Constables Hook.

"The principle laid down was equitable and in our State became legal, for in a suit in ejectment to try the question of title to lands on the Passaic River, over which there was a conflict arising from a difference of opinion as to the direction these lines should take, the rule above set forth was affirmed by the court in the case of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. v. Cornelius Hannon, in 1875, reported in Eighth Vroom, page 276.

"Still another development or modification of this question of the bounds of the lands under water arises from the legal proposition that accretions made and joining to the upland inure to and become the property of the owner of such upland; but the direction of the side lines of such upland owner across this accretion to the new high-water line was the subject of dispute until adjudicated upon by the courts.

"One can readily see, in the case of an owner fronting on the shore, the side lines of whose land approach the shore rapidly converging and leaving but a limited frontage on the high-water line, if this high-water line is extended by land formed in front by accretion, that the continuation in straight lines of these original land lines might very easily meet before the new high-water line was reached and the owner be deprived of any frontage whatever on the water; or, on the other hand, where these land lines in question diverge as they approach the shore, to continue them in straight lines would unduly increase the frontage of such owner by the time they reached the water.

"Another very interesting development of the law of accretions was very thoroughly shown in a case some 25 years ago, in which the owners or successors in title of the Highlands of Navesink sought to eject the Central Railroad Co. and others from the occupation and use of the present strip of land running between the ocean and the Shrewsbury River, between Sandy Hook and Long Branch.

"The title to the locality now known as the Highlands, just south of Sandy Hook, in Monmouth County, on which the conspicuous Twin Lighthouses stand, was vested in the Hartshorne family in 1761, and the Highlands were divided into two equal parts by a line running very nearly east and west. This partition line began at a point back in the country and came down in very nearly a straight line by definite courses and distances to the 'sea.'

"About 25 years ago the successors to the Hartshorne title began suit to eject the Central Railroad Co. and others from the use and occupation of the strip of land running between the ocean and the river, in front of the Highlands, on the ground that their title ran to the 'sea.' Their claim was that their title went across the river and across this strip of sand to the present ocean or 'sea.'

"An examination of the very ancient maps in the possession of the Government in the Congressional Library at Washington, as well as the reading of history, disclosed the fact that at the time of this deed, in 1761, the 'sea' did actually wash up against the foot of the Highlands; there was no strip of sand intervening between the river and the 'sea' and Sandy Hook joined on the Highlands, at what would be the northeast part of the same. The surveys also demonstrated that the distance measured from the original starting point ended at the foot of the Highlands, west of the river, and did not carry across the river to the present shore of the ocean. The Government maps and history also showed that this strip of sand had grown up and joined by accretion to the extension northward of Long Branch and Monmouth Beach, and after a very carefully conducted suit, in which the late Chancellor Williamson and Mr. Robert W. De Forrest appeared for the railroad company and the present Judge William H. Vredenbergh appeared for the successors in title to the Hartshorne family, the courts decided that the lands in question were formed by accretion, joining on to the land to the south, and the railroad company and others, having taken title through this source, were rightfully in possession.

"Dr. Cornelius Brett, in his very valuable paper read before this society March 27, 1908, entitled "The Dutch Settlements in Hudson County," laying the foundation for a series of historical papers, on page 3 says:

"On certain old maps, immediately after Verrazano's voyage in 1527, there began to appear the name of 'Norumbega.' The maps were, of course, rude suggestions of the outlines of sea and shore, without any attempt at measurement or triangulation.

"I have with me this evening a facsimile reproduction of a map of this locality, made about the year 1615, which agrees almost exactly with Dr. Brett's description of the map of 1527, and where it differs, it is a tribute to the doctor's delightfully literary and yet discriminating reading and knowledge of maps.

"The doctor says of the maps of 1527:

"The maps were, of course, rude suggestions of the outlines of sea and shore, without any attempt at measurement or triangulation.

"This was literally true and describes the map of 1615 I have before me, except in this map, nearly 100 years later, some attempt has been made to suggest measurement and triangulation, for the degrees of latitude are shown.

"The writer of this paper has in his possession copies he made in 1882, at the Congressional Library in Washington, of maps of this locality made in 1680 and 1776, which, with the map of 1615, form an interesting exhibit of the progress of cartography in 160 years. These maps show plainly that, at the time there was no strip of sand, as now, forming the Shrewsbury River, but that the sea or ocean washed up against the Highlands, and the inlet described by Cooper is very clearly shown on the interesting United States Coast Survey chart, published about the year 1844.

"I know of no more attractive and truthful description of this locality than that contained in Fenimore Cooper's 'The Water Witch.' He is leading up to the dramatic disappearance of the beautiful niece of Alderman Van Beverout. The worthy alderman saw no sin in pushing commerce a step beyond the limits of the law, and after a bargaining conference with Master Seadrift, of the brigantine Water Witch, who seemed to divide his time between smuggling and love-making, the niece disappeared. Shortly afterwards, during a storm, the Water Witch also disappeared, and the gallant English captain—Ludlow—of her Majesty, Queen Anne's frigate Coquette, in love with the niece as well, was much puzzled to account for her disappearance. He found, upon sounding the inlet the next day, that there were two fathoms of water at high tide, thus explaining the disappearance of the Water Witch.

"Cooper's description of this locality, however, agrees so closely with the conditions of the coast in his day, as shown by the United States Government charts, I am impressed with the thought that the graceful author used them as the mise en scene for his story of happenings back in good Queen Anne's time; he says:

"A happy mixture of land and water, seen by a bright moon and beneath the sky of the fortieth degree of latitude, can not fail to make a pleasing picture. Such was the landscape which the reader must now endeavor to present to his mind.

"The wide estuary of Raritan is shut in from the winds and billows of the open sea by a long, low, and narrow cape, or point, which, by a medley of the Dutch and English languages, that is by no means rare in the names of places that lie within the former territories of the United Provinces of Holland, is known by the name of Sandy Hook. This tongue of land appears to have been made by the unremitting and opposing actions of the waves on one side and the currents of the different rivers that empty their waters into the bay on the other. It is commonly connected with the low coast of New Jersey, to the south; but there are periods of many years in succession, during which there exists an inlet from the sea, between what may be termed the inner end of the cape and the mainland. During these periods Sandy Hook, of course, becomes an island. Such was the fact at the time of which it is our business to write.

"On the subject of maps, I want here to pay tribute to the accuracy of the maps of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey. It would require a paper in itself to give any idea of the devotion and fidelity of the United States Government engineers to this vitally important work from the selection and measurement of the base line, an operation as delicate as the most delicate surgical operation; the determination of the primary triangulation, with its development into the secondary and tertiary; to the filling in of the minutest details, the extent and enormous importance of the hydrographic work to the commerce of the world, as well as to the lives of the millions of human beings coming to and leaving our shores, is too little understood and therefore too little appreciated; but I want here, after an acquaintance with and professional use of the coast survey charts of our Government, extending over 30 years, to testify that I have found them minutely and absolutely accurate and reliable; and I regard the United States Coast Survey Department second to none in importance in its administration of the affairs of our great Nation.

"An interesting decision affecting the law of accretion was given in what is known as the "Shriver Case."

"On July 17, 1897, William Shriver made application, in due form, and complied with all the requirements of the board in furnishing an accurate survey of the lands in front of which the riparian rights were desired, abstract of title, and so forth, and after consideration of the application and action thereon, the board, on August 31, 1897, executed the grant and delivered the same. The grant in question covered a strip of land under water the width of the lot owned by Shriver, and within the side lines of the same, extended from the high-water line as it existed at the time of the grant, about 1,000 feet into the Atlantic Ocean, said grant stating that it was conditional upon Shriver being the riparian owner.

"Subsequent to the time of the grant by the State the action of the ocean was such as to make up or form land in front of the high-water line as it existed at the time of the grant, and upon Shriver taking possession of this accretion the Ocean City Association, in the supreme court, brought suit in ejectment against Shriver to recover possession of the land, and judgment was rendered against said association. Upon the case being carried to the court of errors and appeals, however, the judgment of the supreme court was reversed and judgment given the Ocean City Association.

"The following is a brief statement of the case as presented to the courts:

"The plaintiff, the Ocean City Association, in 1880 purchased a tract containing several thousand acres of wholly unimproved land, known as Pecks Beach, in Cape May County, and lying between the Atlantic Ocean and Great Egg Harbor Bay. On this tract a summer resort known as Ocean City has grown up. In 1883 the association caused a map to be made, showing a part of the above tract laid out into streets, and blocks divided into lots. On this map Ocean Avenue was delineated, practically parallel with and distant some 250 feet inland from the high-water line of the Atlantic Ocean, and the space so intervening was undivided. By deed bearing date October 29, 1884, the association conveyed lot No. 849 to one Henry B. Howell. This lot is on the westerly side of Ocean Avenue, between Ninth and Tenth Streets. It had between it and the Atlantic Ocean, Ocean Avenue and the strip of undivided beach above referred to, and was simply described as a lot 50 by 135, lying between Ocean Avenue on the east and a 15-foot alley on the west. Howell, by deed dated April 21, 1895, conveyed this lot by the same description to William Shriver, the defendant in this suit. There was evidence that the ocean, after 1880, gradually worked inland, carrying away the undivided beach and Ocean Avenue or the greater part of said avenue in front of the lot in question, and that in 1895 the ordinary high water came up to this lot. In 1897 the ocean began to recede, and the grant of the riparian commissioners to Shriver in 1897 indicates a high-water line in Ocean Avenue and west of the center line of the same. The grant by the riparian commissioners to William Shriver, of August 3, 1897, covered in terms a tract of land under water at mean high tide, the width of his lot and within the side lines of the same, extended from the high-water line as it existed at the time of the grant 985 feet into the Atlantic Ocean to the commissioners' exterior line.

"The syllabus of the opinion of the court of errors and appeals, written by Depue, C. J., and dissented from by Magie, Ch., and Dixon and Collins, J. J., is as follows:

"Held, that if the plaintiff (The Ocean City Association) was the owner of the land on the line of ordinary high water in front of this lot at the time of its deed to defendant's grantor, it is the owner of the land obtained by accretion, since the riparian owner is entitled to all alluvial increase, and defendant did not become the owner of the land conveyed by the riparian grant, and therefore an instruction that if the high-water line in 1895 advanced to this lot it became a riparian lot and whatever alluvial increase the ocean in its advance, brought to and in front of the lot belongs to the defendant was erroneous.

"From the reasoning of the court in this case it would seem that if land is carried away by erosion of the ocean, the title to the land so carried away is not lost, but if the ocean recedes and the land reappears and the original ownership is capable of identification, the subject does not lose his property.

"And this principle is set forth in the famous treatise 'de jure maris et brachiorum ejusdem,' ascribed to Lord Chief Justice Hale, the acknowledged authority on this branch of the law, in the following quaint language:

"If a subject hath land adjoining the sea and the violence of the sea swallow it up, but so that there be reasonable marks to continue the notice of it, or though the marks be defaced, yet if by situation and extent of quantity and bounding upon the firm land the same can be known, though the sea leave this land again or it be by art or industry regained, the subject doth not lose his propriety.

"Under this case and adjudication it is of importance for us all, in acquiring riparian rights, either as adjuncts to our business enterprises or as part of our seashore homes, to learn what the position or location of the high-water line was at the time our title originated.

"A very ancient exercise of the ownership of the State over these lands under water took the form of granting to persons the right of fishery, and as early as 1783 this right was exercised by the State and has continued down to the present time. I believe such a fishery right existed in front of the Van Buskirk farm on New York Bay at Constables Hook.

"These fishery rights consisted of a grant of the right to use the shore between high-water mark and low-water mark for the purpose of drawing seines or nets that were used for the best known and popular purpose of catching shad, and those who have witnessed the extensive operations of the shad fisheries on the Delaware will have some idea of the extent and value of these rights. These rights are held paramount to the rights of the upland owner to acquire the land under water for commercial purposes and must be reckoned with or extinguished before they can be disregarded.

"These rights are not so valuable now as they were formerly, for the reason that they are not so productive, the shad being not nearly so plentiful and in some cases having almost disappeared. It will be a surprise to most of us that the catching of whales was ever a New Jersey industry, and nothing indicates in so marked a way the natural changes that take place in the course of years as a reference to an act passed by the Assembly of New Jersey in 1693, which recites as follows:

"'Whalery in the Delaware River has been in so great a mesure invaded by strangers and foreigners,' etc., and enacting:

"'That all persons now residing within the precincts of this province or within the province of Pennsylvania who shall kill or bring on shore any whale or whales within Delaware Bay or elsewhere within the boundaries of this government, to pay one-tenth of the oil to the governor.'

"In the very interesting paper read by Mr. Daniel Van Winkle, president of this society, under the title 'The Dutch under English Rule, 1674–1775,' reference is made, on page 12, as follows:

"Van Vorst's possessions were separated from the mainland by the Mill Creek; a stream of goodly size that wound its tortuous way from the bay at about the present intersection of Johnston Avenue and Phillips Street, and thence in a northerly direction, crossing present Grand Street about 150 feet east of Pacific Avenue, continuing thence still northerly through the marsh to the Point of Rocks, the present site of the Pennsylvania Railroad roundhouse, and along the base of the hill, around back of Aharsimus Cove, meeting the waters of a creek emptying into the bay at Hoboken.

"This stream was of great advantage to the old Dutch residents for readily transporting their farm products to the markets of New York. A favorite landing place was at Newark Avenue where the West Shore freight house now stands, and also at the bridge that crossed the stream near Priors Mill, that stood about the present junction of Freemont Street and Railroad Avenue. Perhaps we may better realize the importance of this stream by inserting the following ad.:

"'11th October, 1770, to be sold.—A large white wood periagua 5 years old, now in good order, with a new suit of sails. She is 32 feet long and 7 feet wide. Suitable for a miller or farmer. She now lies at Priors Mill, in Bergen, where any person may view her.'

"This graphic and interesting description leaves in our minds a delightful picture of a quiet stream that rose and fell with the tides of New York Bay and Hudson River, washing the shores of Communipaw and 'Mill Creek John Van Horn's farm,' and on whose bosom floated the commerce of that ancient time, stopping at the busy shipping ports of Priors Mill and others along its line; but the facts to-day are that the creek in question is nearly obliterated. Some sections of it remain as the axis of a swamp, but the greater part of it has been filled in and is covered by buildings either for dwelling or commercial uses.

"Still, the title of the State to the lands originally flowed by this ancient stream, so graphically portrayed, remains; and even to-day, when property is transferred, any part of which occupies the site of the now obliterated Mill Creek—this 'stream of goodly size'—it is necessary, before the title companies will guarantee and insure the title, for the State to release, by deed signed by the governor and sealed with the great seal of the State, attested by the secretary of state, its ancient rights in the premises.

"It must have been with some surprise, and, it may be, indignation, that our neighbors, the Stratfords, in the course of the formation of a company in the development of their important paper industry on Cornelison Avenue, just south of Montgomery Street, as recently as 1905, found it necessary to secure the State's title to the lands anciently flowed by Oyster Creek, which lazily meandered, a tributary to Mill Creek. We can hardly imagine such a thing as taking oysters from this locality.

"In considering the development of the water front of our county we shall find that our early legislators found it necessary to remonstrate and protest against the actions and attitude of our neighbors across the Hudson. This question is not a sentimental one as regards the interest and history of Hudson County's water front.

"Previous to August 11, 1880, the matter of fixing exterior lines for docks, etc., on the waters of New York Bay and waters tributary thereto was left largely in the hands of the municipalities interested and resulted in encroachments on the waterways that were viewed with alarm by students of the subject. I think without doubt both New York and New Jersey were open to criticism; but in a report made by a commission appointed by our legislature in 1848 to ascertain the extent and value of the lands under water in Hudson County reference is made to the boundary-line agreement of 1834, as follows:

"The boundary line between the States of New York and New Jersey, * * * shall be the middle of said river, etc. Since the date of this agreement, very extensive alterations of the New York shore, etc., have been made, etc., and yet larger extensions are in serious agitation. It is respectfully submitted that measures should be adopted to ascertain and locate this boundary line by survey monuments, etc., before it is involved in incertitude and possible dispute, etc.

"This suggestion was not adopted, and the very result predicted followed. It was not until 1888—40 years after—that the boundary line was definitely fixed, and it was necessary to resurrect and reconstruct the maps of the shore line of 1834 in order properly to do so.

"This report of the commissioners in 1848 is a most interesting one and will repay careful reading in its entirety; but I will give some extracts which, I think, will interest you.

"The report states that the commissioners met in Jersey City on June 6, 1848, and at subsequent times; that they had a map prepared to exhibit the water line of the county of Hudson; that the map was prepared 'in a manner entirely satisfactory by Andrew Clerk, Esq., of Jersey City'; and a series of 13 written questions were submitted to the corporation of Jersey City and others, 'and full and explicit replies obtained.'

"The commissioners make graceful asknowledgment in the following language:

"The commissioners desire to make grateful acknowledgment for these and other facilities, and indeed for a kind and courteous reception on the part of all with whom they came in contact in the prosecution of their inquiries.

"Then follows an interesting description of the shore line of Hudson County and a reference to the ancient grants and laws affecting the subject.

"I shall refer here to only a few of the questions and answers above referred to.

"Fourth. To what purpose or uses are or may the lands between high-water line and the channel or New York line be applied?

"Answer by Jersey City:

"Some of the lands below high-water line on the east side of Hudson County are occupied for piers and wharves. A portion of said lands have been reclaimed and applied to streets, building lots, etc. Nearly all the flats on the east side of the county may be advantageously applied to the same and kindred purposes.

"Sixth. To what uses are such lands applied which lie south of Jersey City, and to what further uses may they be applied, if reclaimed, under the authority of the State now and prospectively?

"Answer by Jersey City:

"The lands flowed by the tides south of Jersey City are all natural oyster beds and furnish subsistence to a large number of fishermen. If reclaimed, these lands would be valuable as building lots.

"Eighth. How much of the lands formerly covered by water has been reclaimed within the limits of Jersey City? How reclaimed, and to what uses put?

"Answer by Jersey City:

"About 10 acres of land formerly covered by water have been reclaimed in Jersey City by filling in with earth to raise it above high water. It is used for streets and building lots and is worth at least $200,000. The entire profits of the speculation have been received by the 'asociates of the Jersey company,' who, as pretended owners, either reclaimed the land and then sold it in building lots to others, or, as in most cases, sold * * * the submerged land in its natural state, to be filled up by the purchaser. A small portion of the reclaimed land is held by lessees of the associates for a coal depot and landing place for the Cunard steamers.

"Tenth. What was the extent of the projected improvement north of Jersey City?

"Answer by Jersey City:

"The projected 'improvement,' so called, is believed to embrace at least 12 acres.

"These answers will cause us to smile as we contemplate the present development of the water front of our county.

"This same series of questions was propounded to H. Southmayd, Esq., and I give his answer to the eighth question, as it gives so intelligent a description of the conditions in lower Jersey City at that time:

"Question 8. How much of the lands formerly covered by water has been reclaimed within the limits of Jersey City? How reclaimed, and to what uses put?

"Answer. Jersey City in the year 1804 contained 73 acres 3 rods and 30 links, as will appear by a map of Richard Outwater made about that time. When the associates bought Mangin's map was made and laid out all of Jersey City, containing 73 acres, as before stated, including 23 acres of land under water unreclaimed lying around the city. Eleven acres of this 23 are still under water and unreclaimed. Nearly 4 acres of the land reclaimed have been reclaimed by the New Jersey Railroad for their depot and for the depot of the Hudson River Railroad Co., for which they paid but a nominal consideration to the associates of the Jersey company, nearly 2 acres, or a block of 32 lots, by the Morris Canal Co., also paying a nominal consideration, the remainder being 104 lots, or about 6½ acres, by the associates of the Jersey company and their grantees. Besides this, the associates, 30 or 40 years since, reclaimed a strip of land east of Hudson Street of about 20 feet wide, beginning at Essex Street and extending to York, about 1,000 feet; and recently the land now used by the Cunard Line of mail steamers between Jersey City and Liverpool was reclaimed by the associates, containing about 30 lots, exclusive of wharves and streets. The uses for which the property thus reclaimed has been put have been stated to wit, the strip of land east of Hudson Street, the Cunard improvement for the accommodation of that line of steamers, the New Jersey Railroad and Hudson River Railroad depots, the Morris Canal Wharf Some of the land reclaimed is now owned by private individuals; that is to say, some lots on Hudson Street and some on Montgomery Street and other parts of the city, on which dwelling houses, hotels, stores, manufactories, foundries, etc., have been erected. Forty-eight lots have been given for church, school, market, and public grounds. The manner in which this land has been reclaimed has been mostly by building bulkheads, filling them up with broken rock, stone, and by surplus earth from the streets and rubbish from the city of New York. Recently the mud outside of the bulkhead has been applied to the filling up inside by a dredging machine; this, though expensive, is in a measure compensated by the greater depth of water obtained.

"J. D. Miller, Esq., made a general reply to the thirteenth question only. Mr. Miller states that:

"He is the owner in right of his wife of about 200 feet of shore in township of Van Vorst, in the county of Hudson, extending along and fronting on Harsimus Bay or Hudson River. It is an ancient shore, against which the tides always have and still do flow. It has been held and enjoyed by the former owners as a shore for more than 200 years. * * * The land under water in front of this shore has been used and enjoyed from time to time by the former owners, to some extent, for an oyster fishery.

"Mr. Miller expresses the opinion that he is entitled to the right of enjoying and improving all the lands under water in front of said shore, subject only to the adjudicated and acknowledged right of the State of New Jersey, a very wise and proper answer and one that was very much of the same purport, but 16 years earlier, than the opinion of Chancellor Zabriskie.

"Some of the categorical answers will cause a smile as we look at the present development of the water front of Jersey City.

"In the year 1849 the legislature passed an act to compensate these commissioners, as follows (P. L. 1849, p. 336):

"To compensate the commissioners therein named:

"Be it resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That the treasurer of this State be authorized and directed to pay to the commissioners appointed by resolution of 23d of February, 1848, to investigate and report as to the extent and value of the lands under water owned by the State, within the limits of the county of Hudson, as follows:

"To William H. Leupp, chairman of the said commissioners, for per diem, mileage, and drawing report, $200.

"To Martin J. Ryerson, one of said commissioners, for per diem, mileage, and services, $150.

"To George F. Fort, one of said commissioners, for per diem, mileage, and services, $150.

"To Andrew Clerk, for preparing map for the State, by order of said commissioners, $75.

"Approved March 2, 1849.

"The Andrew Clerk above mentioned being the partner of Robert C. Bacot, engineer.

"New Jersey seems to have kept its eyes jealously on New York, for on March 14, 1855, the legislature passed a joint resolution (P. L. 1855, p. 800), as follows:

"In relation to encroachments made in the harbor of New York.

"Whereas it is alleged that, by certain erections made and contemplated in the East and Hudson Rivers, under and by authority of the State of New York, the usefulness of the Brooklyn Navy Yard is impaired, if not endangered, and the channels of the East River and the Hudson River much innovated upon and narrowed to the injury of the main entrance channel of the harbor of New York and to the injury of the Jersey shore, and also to the navigation of the Passaic River, leading to Newark, the largest port of entry in this State; and

"Whereas, also, counter encroachments upon the part of New Jersey would greatly injure the navigation of the Hudson, and impair the usefulness and capacity of the harbor of New York; and

"Whereas, also, the establishment of a water line, outside of which no erections should be made, would seem to be necessary to arrest similar innovations in future: Therefore be it

"1. Resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That the Legislature of the State of New York be requested, so far as the same may be within its power, to cancel and repeal all grants to build and erect wharves, piers, bulkheads, and docks, in the immediate neighborhood of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, the erection whereof would injure and impair the usefulness thereof, and to remove the more glaring erections in the East River, to the injury of the commerce and harbor of New York, and also to the injury of New Jersey; and be it

"2. Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of New York be requested in such manner and by such means as it may think best, to survey, lay out, and establish in the rivers and harbor of New York an exterior water line, beyond which no erections shall hereafter be made to the injury of the commerce of New York, or to, either directly or indirectly, injure the State of New Jersey; and be it

"3. Resolved, That the governor of this State be requested to forward an attested copy of the above resolutions to his excellency the governor of the State of New York, to be laid before the legislature of said State.

"Approved March 14, 1855.

"We can hardly think the concern of our early legislators for the Brooklyn Navy Yard was wholly unselfish, for this was followed up by what must have seemed to the citizens of the cities of New York and Brooklyn an impertinent, if pertinent, report to the legislature of our State, as follows:

REPORT.

"The joint committee of the two houses appointed in conformity with the communication from his excellency Gov. Price, communicating an invitation to meet the governor and the committee of commerce of the Legislature of New York for the purpose of viewing and considering the encroachments upon the bay and harbor of New York,

REPORT

"That on the 30th day of January last, your committee, accompanied by his excellency Gov. Price and E. L. Viele, Esq., the engineer of our State geological survey, proceeded to New York, and at the time appointed met his excellency Gov. Clark, of the State of New York, the committee of commerce of said State, the State engineer, with other gentlemen occupying important offices under the government of that State.

"That your committee, in connection with the above-mentioned authorities of the State of New York, the governors of New Jersey and Connecticut, accompanied also by officers of the Government in charge of the navy yard, with other persons representing the commercial interests of New York, proceeded to examine certain encroachments made, and in progress, and contemplated upon the Brooklyn side of the East River.

"Your committee upon the first view of the matter regarded such encroachments as matters with which New Jersey had no interest, and should not express any opinion; but upon reflecting they came to the conclusion that such encroachments were prejudicial to her, inasmuch as they jeopardized the interests which New Jersey has, in common with every other State of the Union, in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and the immense Government expenditures at that point.

"The report then goes on to state the effect of these encroachments at the navy yard upon the Sandy Hook Channel, affecting the interests of New Jersey through her water front on the Hudson River and New York Bay, and stating the extent of the encroachments on the East River, the effect on its channels, and, calling attention to the injury done, report their visit to Jersey City as follows:

"The committee also visited Jersey City for the purpose of examining if any and what encroachments had been made there, and it was a matter of just pride to your committee that, comparatively speaking, no encroachments had been made upon the Jersey side; yet your committee think that the wharves and piers lately erected by the New Jersey Railroad Co. are extended farther than well comports with the interests of New Jersey in this important matter of keeping unimpaired the harbor of New York.

"By these two docks some encroachment, in the opinion of your committee, has been made on the channel of the Hudson River, narrowing and deepening the river at this point. The same authority which claims the legal right and which authorized these extensions could, had they seen fit, have extended them by the same claim of power some thousand feet farther into the river, producing the same deplorable results now existing in the East River between New York and Brooklyn. Your committee are informed that the right by which these innovations are made, or claimed to be made, are claimed under the charter to the Jersey Associates, giving them power to improve their lands under water. It would seem that a power of this kind to impair the great interests of New Jersey in the harbor of New York should be found in a strict construction of explicit legislation, and if the rights by which these encroachments are made are restrainable, they should, if possible, be restrained by timely legislation for the public good.

"The committee then goes on to call attention to the necessity for the full flow of the tide through the Hudson and East Rivers, the Passaic and Hackensack Rivers, in order to keep unimpaired the Sandy Hook Channel, and concludes its report by saying:

"Inasmuch as the State of New York has been the cause of this triple injury to New Jersey, your committee are of the opinion that the Legislature of the State of New Jersey should, by resolution, express her dissatisfaction thereat and request in a friendly way the State of New York to repeal all fraudulent grants improperly obtained from the State to the injury of the navy yard or the harbor and, by purchase or otherwise, remove other innovations upon the East River that now exist to the injury of New York and New Jersey.

"Two joint resolutions were prepared in accordance with the above report calling attention to the situation as set forth in the report and providing for the appointment of commissioners to advise as to the proper control of the development of these water-front lands..

"What the feelings of these ancient legislators would be if they could view the changes that have taken place in our shore front since their time is hard to conjecture. They 'viewed with just pride (in 1855), that, comparatively speaking, 'no encroachments' (as they called the development of our water front) 'had been made upon the Jersey side, except the New Jersey Railroad Pier and Cunard Dock,' and they 'regarded with concern the power given the Jersey Associates and others to improve their lands under water and thought they should be restrained for the public good.'

"How fortunate for us as a county their fears and forebodings were not regarded seriously, or we might still have Harsimus Cove as an oyster ground and the shore of the Hudson River about the middle of Hudson Street. It might, however, be some consolation to them to know that the 'South Cove grant' is still as it was in 1872 and still a name to conjure with.

"Maj. William L. Marshall, now brigadier general, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, was asked whether he thought the scour of the currents was going to maintain the required depth in the 'Ambrose Channel,' which you know is the new and direct channel from the Narrows to the sea. Gen. Marshall conceived the idea of this important work, and it is still under his charge, although he is now Chief of Engineers. The general smiled in his good-humored way and replied: 'Well, if it don't, there are plenty of dredges that will.'

"And the direful results which were feared in 1855 have not followed; the great development of our water front is ours; and if we have to dredge a little now and then, we have the commerce that requires it and the means with which to do it.

"On August 11, 1880, Congress passed an act empowering the Secretary of War to establish harbor lines, and on October 4, 1888, the Secretary of War authorized the appointment of a board of engineers to be called the New York Harbor Line Board, composed of United States Army officers, who were necessarily by their training also engineers; this board to act in an advisory capacity to the Secretary of War on all matters relating to the waters of the Bay of New York and waters tributary thereto. This law has been amended from time to time, the present law on the subject being contained in section 11 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899.

"Since 1880 all applications for the establishment of dock lines must be made to the Secretary of War, who refers them to this harbor-line board, who, after public hearings, advise and recommend lines to the Secretary of War for his approval; and under the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, no structure or filling in is allowed to be commenced in these waters unless the lines for the same have been passed upon by the Secretary of War.

"The State of New Jersey, as well as the city of New York, has been active and persistent in securing the consent of the Secretary of War to the extension of the dock lines on the Hudson River, New York Bay, and waters tributary thereto. Both sides have succeeded in securing extensions, until it seems that the waterway of the Hudson River could no further be judiciously encroached upon. The claim or charge is made by New York that Hudson County has been a greater trespasser than New York, and instances the extension of the shore line of Harsimus Cove some 3,000 feet in support of this charge; but it must be remembered that Harsimus Cove is or was an indentation into the westerly shore of the Hudson River, between Castle Point and North Point, in Jersey City, on which Edge's windmill stood, had very little water over it, and the filling in of the same was an advantage to the regimen of the Hudson River; while New York has made its greatest encroachment some 1,300 feet into the river at its narrowest point, opposite Castle Point, leaving only a width of half a mile in the river at that point.

"We must remember also in this connection that the channel of the river is on the New York side of the center, and within the past month we have been treated to the strange sight of an ocean steamer, the Deutchland, hard and fast aground just in front of the ferry at the foot of Exchange Place, Jersey City, by reason of the northerly winds making an unusually low ebb tide.

"But what compensation time brings. Directly underneath where this steamer was held by the mud of the river bottom, busy men were working and construction cars were running to and fro through the twin tunnels that will soon connect Exchange Place, Jersey City, with Cortlandt Street, New York; and directly under where the ancient ferryboat, D. S. Gregory, is shown in the advertisement previously referred to, of lots for sale on Hudson Street in 1857, run these two tunnels that shall take us, in two or three minutes, to the business center of New York, while, with the D. S. Gregory, it took us half an hour at best, and sometimes half a day.

"The history of the development of Hudson County would not be complete without reference to these tunnels and to the courage and genius of the men who have made them an accomplished fact.

"The first tunnel was from Fifteenth Street, Jersey City, to Morton Street, New York.

"The tunnel in question has a history involving the financial and engineering ambitions and hopes of men long since ruined and dead. The river ooze, through which the present construction to-day so eloquently and convincingly testifies to the skill and energy of the engineers who planned and executed it, once held in its slimy embrace the bodies of men whose lives had been drowned out by the inrush of the waters of the Hudson River, and although the tragedy is now almost forgotten, in the New York Bay Cemetery, in Jersey City, stands a modest shaft, surmounted by the figure of a man. On the face of the stone the legend reads: 'In memory of Peter Woodland, aged 32, killed in the disaster at the Hudson River Tunnel, on Wednesday, July 21, 1880.' And he was a man, for he elected to drown with 14 of his workmen in his effort to save them rather than save himself.

"The history of this tunnel, or these tunnels (for there are two), each designed for single track—one eastward and one westward, but coming together at either end—goes back over a quarter of a century.

"In the year 1874 a company obtained a franchise and began operations. The method of construction adopted was the use of compressed air, but the shield, so successfully used by the present engineers, was not thought of, and to its absence was due the frightful tragedy above referred to. After the accident in 1880 work was abandoned until 1890, when a syndicate of English capitalists was formed, which prosecuted the work, accomplishing about 1,500 feet in the north tunnel and about 600 feet in the south tunnnel. Striking a ledge of rock, however, at this time, and no doubt striking much more formidable rocks in their financial boring, the project was abandoned.

"Then came Mr. William G. McAdoo, a New York lawyer, as president, who associated with himself Mr. Charles M. Jacobs and Mr. John V. Davies, the eminent engineers; and under the masterly supervision of these men the river tunnels are an accomplished fact.

RECEIPTS.

"The total receipts from the sale of riparian lands up to the present time amount to about $6,000,000, and the greater part of this has come from the sale of the water front of Hudson County. It is estimated that there are still in the possession of the State lands that will come into use within a reasonable period valued at perhaps three and a half million, and still other lands that will have to wait for future development, valued at perhaps ten million.

"The administration of this valuable and important interest of the State is one requiring careful consideration. It is a subject but little understood; it is a matter in which the interests of a greater part of the State seem opposed to that of the other part, and, as in other important matters, opinions are most freely expressed by those having the least knowledge on the subject.

"The policy of the State has been to sell these lands for commercial development. This has brought a considerable revenue into the State and into the school fund; it has made possible the establishment on our shores of important industries. A representative committee, composed of senators and members of the legislature in 1906, who gave this subject careful consideration and made a personal examination of the improvements, stated in their report that they—"were not prepared to advise that the policy which had made possible this development was really wrong—

"and while this is negative praise, it is their opinion after careful consideration, and if any other conclusion could have been reached, it no doubt would have been.

"The opinion is expressed by people who evidently do not fully understand the subject that these lands should have been 'held,' as they term it, for the use of the State.

"In the first place, this opinion carries with it an apparent ignorance of the fact that while the State is the owner of the land under water, subject to the rights or equities, if any, of the shore owner, it owns no upland; has no means of access from the land to the water, or of access from the water to the land; and, as a practical question, the upland owner is the only person who can buy the land under water and administer it.

"Having in mind the fact that these lands under water are appurtenant to upland wholly under the title and control of private ownership, to obtain which, if there was any law making such a thing possible by the right of eminent domain, could only be acquired by the State upon payment to such owners of the full value of the upland, which value would have reflected in it the principal value which is now supposed to be attached to the land under water, there would be no practical way in which it could appropriate and expend the millions necessary to any development, to say nothing of the impossibility of anticipating what kind of development would meet the requirements and needs of the various enterprises seeking location on our shores.

"Some of these tracts for which the State has realized enormous sums during the past years are comparatively small holdings, part only of the holdings and works of enterprises already located there and forming part of the tangible wealth and worth of the State—many of them unattractive water fronts needing the iniative of interested owners who have sought out and induced enterprises to come to this State and locate, and who have expended millions of dollars in making the location of these enterprises possible, but only after seeking them out and finding just what kind of development is demanded for that particular industry.

"In most of these cases these owners have become the pioneers in the development of a section that had theretofore escaped the notice or had not been impressed on men responsible for the establishment of manufacturing and other enterprises needing water front, and the result of this individual enterprise has been the creation of new communities as well as the rehabilitation of older ones.

"It would have seemed not only a commercial absurdity, but an affront to these men, who, in advance of their time and without the encouragement of their fellows, sought out these enormous enterprises and brought them to the shores of New Jersey, not to have had the cooperation and encouragement of the State in their efforts to induce the holders of capital to locate within the borders of our State.

"The impression seems to be in the minds of some that the State of New Jersey held in completeness and perfection some going concern, or at least a water front developed as to its docking and wharfing privileges, improved and made suitable for the erection of buildings and works, with surrounding accommodations for the housing and schooling and churching of the operatives of these works, with the necessary railroad connections, and, in short, a city complete and perfect, except for the occupants.

"The exact reverse of all this is true. The State owns not a single foot of upland. A great deal of the upland in question is difficult of improvement and development; a great deal of it must be filled up at enormous expense and the railroads must be brought to it; and, more than all, in almost every instance the water front itself is not capable, in its present condition, of use, but must be made so by the expenditure of large sums of money by the owner of the upland in order to create such a depth of water as to make the narrow frontage sold by the State available for commercial uses.

"In this connection it is of interest to hark back to the report of the legislative committee on this very subject of the policy of the disposition of the State's lands, in which Hudson County is so vitally interested, made to the legislature on January 15, 1883, over 26 years ago; the committee says:

"Had this question been considered at the outset of action by the State, doubtless much might have been said on both sides of the proposition of long leases by the State, but we are not prepared to suggest that policy now. It is urged with great force that the best commercial results can not be attained except by a title as complete as the State can give.

STATEMENT OF DEVELOPMENT.

"A statement of the location and extent of the water front of Hudson County, much of which has been reclaimed and improved, will be of interest:

"From the county line on the north to the north side of Weehawken Cove—about 3 miles—the exterior line for improvements is on an average 1,000 feet beyond the original shore line and comprises about 350 acres.

"This section includes the famous dueling ground where Hamilton and Burr fought.

"At Weehawken Cove, in front of the famous Elysian Fields, the line for improvements is half a mile beyond the original shore at its greatest distance, and the cove is about 1 mile in length and covers about 130 acres.

"The Elysian Fields was the scene of the murder of the attractive tobacco-shop girl, Mary Cecelia Rogers, on July 25, 1841. The Elysian Fields of that day, no doubt, corresponded to the Coney Island of a later day. This murder formed the foundation for Poe's 'Mystery of Marie Roget,' which was written in Philadelphia and appeared in Snowden's Lady's Companion in November, December, 1842, February, 1843.

"The facts in this celebrated case that made the Elysian Fields famous, or infamous, almost the world over are as follows:

"Mary Cecelia Rogers, when about 19 years of age, was known as 'the pretty cigar girl,' she having worked in John Anderson's tobacco shop at 321 Broadway. New York then had a population of 300,000, living mostly below Canal Street.

"Mary's widowed mother kept a boarding house at 126 Nassau Street.

"A few weeks before her death she left Anderson's employ and assisted her mother in the boarding house, when it became known that she had accepted an offer of marriage from Daniel C. Payne, one of the boarders, a young man employed as a cork cutter at 47 John Street.

"On a beautiful Sunday morning, the 25th of July, 1841, Mary told her fiance, about 10 o'clock in the morning, that she intended spending the day with her aunt, a Mrs. Downing, who lived at 68 Jane Street, and she would return by the Broadway stage, reaching Ann Street about 6 o'clock in the evening.

"Although the morning was fair a violent thunderstorm broke out in the afternoon, the rain falling in torrents. The storm was so formidable that Payne—who does not appear to have been a very ardent lover, although he committed suicide soon after the death of his betrothed—did not go to meet the stage, thinking Mary, on account of the storm, would remain at her aunt's overnight; and it was not until noon of the next day that the fact of her disappearance became known: and although probably the best known young woman in New York, not a person could be found who had seen her after she left her home at 10 o'clock on Sunday morning.

"On the Wednesday following her dead body was found floating off Castle Point, Hoboken, bearing every indication of having been murdered and plundered.

"Numerous arrests were made, but nothing was discovered until John Adams, a New Jersey stage driver, gave information that he had seen Mary Rogers arrive in Hoboken by Bull's ferry, accompanied by a tall, well-dressed man of dark complexion, and go with him to a resort near the Elysian Fields, known as Nick Moore's, but kept by a Mrs. Loss. Mrs. Loss admitted that this was true, and that after partaking of some refreshments the pair had gone in the direction of the woods. Two months after the death of Mary Rogers Mrs. Loss informed the police that her sons had found the girl's parasol and gloves in a thicket near by. It was now believed that the time and place of the tragedy had been discovered, but opinions differ as to whether she had been murdered by the tall, dark companion or by one of the gangs of ruffians that frequented the Fields at that day.

"It appeared that Mrs. Loss was shot by one of her sons (accidentally, he said) on October 24, 1842, and died on the 9th of November following. It seems that Mrs. Loss could not keep from talking of the Mary Rogers affair, and it is supposed that the sons, fearing their mother would reveal the secret of the murder, encompassed her death by the alleged accidental shooting.

"In 1904 a Mr. Clemens discovered a vital clue in the newspaper of August 5, 1841, as follows:

"On August 3, the body of an unknown man, about 35 years of age, was found floating near the foot of Barclay Street. The body had been in the water some days. The unknown was a tall, swarthy man, and was without a coat.

"The conclusion Mr. Clemens comes to—and he thinks it is strange it should not have occurred to the authorities at that time—is that Mary Rogers and the 'tall, dark man' were marooned by the terrific rainstorm and were killed by the sons of Mrs. Loss and cast into the river.

"It is a curious and interesting coincidence that the name of 'Loss,' so tragically prominent in the celebrated case of 1841, should be the same as the surveyor who made the map of Hoboken in 1804, which is the authority for the original shore line, and is mentioned in hundreds of conveyances and titles in Hoboken as the 'Loss Map of 1804.' I do not regard this similarity of names as any reflection on the character of the surveyor of that ancient time any more than I do the similarity in the names of the indifferent wooer of the unfortunate Mary Rogers and that of the writer of this paper; the old adage, perhaps, applies: 'A rose by any other name,' etc.

"The front of the city of Hoboken, from Castle Point to Hoboken Ferry—about three-quarters of a mile—has the line for improvements about 1,200 feet beyond the original shore line and covers about 150 acres.

"At Harsimus Cove, from Hoboken Ferry to Montgomery Street in Jersey City—about a mile and a half in length—the line is, on an average, 3,200 feet beyond the original shore line and comprises about 575 acres.

"At Communipaw Bay, to the line of Communipaw Lane—about a mile long and three-quarters of a mile wide—containing about 475 acres.

"New York Bay to Constables Hook—about 4 miles long—the exterior line for improvements is about 6,000 feet beyond the original shore line, covering about 2,500 acres.

"Kill von Kull front of Bayonne—3¼ miles in length—almost entirely developed, with an average distance of 600 feet beyond the original line for improvements, covering about 230 acres.

"With the miles of but slightly improved stretches of Newark Bay and Hackensack and Passiac River shores, comprising about 5,000 acres in all, on which now stands the water front development of Hudson County. It is a matter of growth coincident with the development and growth of the Nation, and is a monument to the enterprise of the pioneers who brought it about and to the spirit of New Jersey that made it possible.

"A talented and enthusiastic young minister, lately called to one of our prominent churches, said recently:

"I am not interested in the past development of the water front of Hudson County, but I am interested to know what the development is going to be in the future.

"I say to that young man, he can predict, with fair certainty, what the future development will be by studying the development of the past, and in no other way.

"What this development would have been if left in the hands of the municipalities comprising the county is entirely conjectural, but it may be of interest to recall that the legislature, by act of April 4, 1872, granted to the city of Jersey City, for the nominal consideration of $1,000, a tract of land under water in the lower part of old Jersey City, lying between the extension of Van Vorst Street and Grove Street, containing about 20 acres. This grant was made conditional upon the payment by the municipality of $1,000, but so little was thought of this now considered valuable tract of land that the municipality refused to pay this nominal sum and thus perfect its title.

"Under the presumption that the municipality had forfeited its rights to these lands under water in question the State of New Jersey, in 1874, purported to vacate the same, and embodied them in a grant to the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey. Subsequent litigation, however, brought forth the decision of the courts of last resort in the State that the title of the municipality of Jersey City to these lands was still in force, and the city thereupon carried out the provisions of the act and became the absolute owner of these lands. The fact remains, however, that from 1872 up to the present time—a period of 37 years—no use has been made by the municipality of this tract of land under water and no development attempted.

"In 1878 the State granted to the municipality of Jersey City a tract of land under water on the Hudson River 130 feet in width, adjoining Morgan Street on the south, and for some reason no profitable use has ever been made of this water-front holding.

"In 1886 the State granted to the municipality of Bayonne three tracts of land under water—one on New York Bay near the foot of East Thirty-fifth Street, one on Kill van Kull at the foot of Ingham Avenue, and one on Newark Bay at the foot of West Thirtieth Street.

"No development or use has been made of the New York Bay tract; a dock has been built on the Kill van Kull tract; and a dock has been built on the Newark Bay tract, both used by the public.

"These are about the only cases of municipal administration of water-front property in Hudson County.

THE USE MADE OF THE PROCEEDS OF THE SALES OF THE STATE'S LANDS UNDER WATER.

"On March 31, 1869 (P. L. 1869, p. 1017), an act was passed creating the present board of control of the riparian interests of the State, and section 10 of that act provided that the moneys received from such sales should first be appropriated to the payment of the expenses of its administration, then to the payment and liquidation of the State debt, and afterwards invested and the interest paid over to the trustees for the maintenance of free schools.

"On April 6, 1871 (P. L. 1871, p. 98), an act was passed devoting all moneys thereafter received from the sale and rental of lands under water to the support of free public schools.

"On March 19, 1890 (P. L. 1890, p. 92), an act was passed repealing the above and making the proceeds of the sales and leases of these lands made after the passage of the act applicable to the 'necessary' expenses of the State. This was under Gov. Abbett's administration, but on April 24, 1894 (P. L. 1894, p. 123), under Gov. Werts's administration, an act was passed repealing the last-mentioned act and devoting the proceeds of the sales and leases of the riparian lands again to the support of free public schools.

"In an opinion by Attorney General Samuel H. Grey in 1901 the learned attorney general expressed the opinion that any money, stock, or other property appropriated to the support of free public schools under the provision of the constitution (art. 4, sec. 7, par. 6) were constituted a fund that could not be devoted to any other purpose than the support of free public schools. And in the light of this opinion it is questionable whether the use of the moneys from the sale of the riparian lands between the years 1890 and 1894, during which period they were diverted to general State purposes, was a lawful use of the money; but there is no question that now all of the proceeds of the disposition of the State's lands is devoted to the support of free public schools throughout the State.

"Article 4, section 7, paragraph 6 of the constitution of the State provides:

"That the fund for the support of free schools and all money, stock, and other property which may hereafter be appropriated for that purpose shall be securely invested and remain a perpetual fund.

"The board having control of the fund is called "trustees of the school fund," and is composed of the governor of the State, the secretary of state, the attorney general, the State comptroller, and the State treasurer.

SOME OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

"In conclusion, in connection with the development and administration of the water front of Hudson County, it is interesting to note the names of some of the men who were intrusted with this duty.

"We find that, in 1848, a committee, composed of W. H. Leupp, Martin J. Ryerson, and George F. Fort, were appointed 'to investigate and report as to the extent and value of the lands under water owned by the State within the limits of the county of Hudson,' and reported to the legislature.

"It is an interesting fact that the George F. Fort referred to in 1848 was governor of the State of New Jersey from 1851 to 1854, and is the uncle of the present governor of New Jersey, Hon. John Franklin Fort. So the fact appears that the administration of this great asset of the State began in the same family, in 1848, that is administering it in 1909, 61 years after.

"In 1864 a committee was appointed to inquire into the subject of the riparian rights of the State, and among the commissioners appointed for that duty we find the name of Jacob R. Wortendyke, father of the present assistant engineer of Jersey City, and of Mrs. Watson, the wife of Dr. W. Perry Watson; also at that early day we find Robert C. Bacot, Esq., for many years an honored resident of Jersey City, as superintendent and engineer; and it is interesting to note that Mr. Bacot continued as such superintendent and engineer until the year 1897, a period of 33 years, when, by reason of age, he retired with the respect and regret of those associated with him in the administration of this trust.

"In 1869 the commission contained the name of Peter Vredenburgh, father of James B. Vredenburgh, the eminent counselor of our own city, and of Judge William H. Vredenburgh, of Freehold; also the name of Hon. Bennington F. Randolph, father-in-law of Gov. Joseph D. Bedle, and others.

"No thoughtful person can regard the subject of the development of our water front without interest.

"There stands on a prominent point of land on the east shore of the Hudson River, inclosed by a plain iron barrier, under the shadow of Grant's Tomb, a simple stone monument, on which is inscribed, 'Erected to the memory of an amiable child.' This stone has stood there a hundred years and more. I know of no better spot from which to obtain a view of the magnificent development of the water front of the northern part of our county than this; and I know of nothing that so strongly impresses the mind with the fact of the passage of time.

"As you look on the resting place of this sleeping child, 'the world forgetting, by the world forgot,' you are back a hundred years in the quiet of undisturbed nature. Raise your eyes, and you look on another order of things—the life and activities of the commercial world of to-day.

"Or stand on the upper deck of one of our uptown ferryboats, or one of the Staten Island ferryboats, and let your eyes thoughtfully rest on the development of the shores of our county—all gained out of the mud and slime of the shoals of our water front—and you will be impressed by what has been accomplished.

"How easy it is to criticize, and what wonders are not performed by men, whose chief claim to distinction is an abnormally developed hindsight.

"But we write of men of the past. What they lacked in spectacular and sensational activities they made up in solid worth and character, and theirs is an inheritance to be preserved. They laid the foundations with dignity and builded with integrity; and the Hudson County Historical Society does well to add to its archives the names of men and their achievements which have stood the test of time."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED].

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, the only connection between the subject of the pending bill and the subject which I rose to mention in the brief space of one minute is the fact that all sailor men and others on shipboard are apt to catch cold, and in this connection I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in order to have printed a very able, scientific, and practical address delivered by my old professor on the practice of medicine, Dr. William Hanna Thomson, of the city of New York, on the subject of catching cold and the methods of preventing it; a most practical and useful address, which he made when he was installed as president of the New York Academy of Medicine, and which I commend to all the Members of the House and their constituents. [Applause.]

The address above referred to is as follows:

HOW PEOPLE "CATCH A COLD" AND HOW TO CURE IT—DR. WILLIAM HANNA THOMSON GIVES SOME PRACTICAL AND TIMELY ADVICE.

[By William Hanna Thomson, M. D., LL. D.]

"A fact which concerns everyone is that the commonest cause of disease and death outside of hot, moist climates is from 'catching cold.'

"I first drew attention to the mechanism of this derangement in my inaugural as president of the New York Academy of Medicine in 1899. But, though this is true, the mechanism of this disorder is wholly unknown by the general public, and it is high time that the medical profession should widely circulate the facts which have been discovered relating to this important subject. 'Catching cold' is by no means the same thing as being chilled by cold, for a person may be warmly clad all over and yet by simply getting his feet wet in melting snow catch a cold which may cause his death from all sorts of internal complications, resulting from a localized chill of his lower extremities.

"The first explanation which we would offer is that the constant flow of arterial and not of venous blood is absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the integrity of every bodily tissue. This was strikingly illustrated by the experiment of Overbach, who, after simply clamping the arteries of the kidneys for 40 minutes, so deranged the internal structure of those organs that albuminuria was caused for 20 days before the kidneys returned to their normal condition.

"Throughout the body, therefore, a most careful supervision over the flow of the blood through the arteries is maintained, because even a very temporary interference with the arterial flow produces serious changes in the parts supplied by those arteries. It should be steadily borne in mind that the trouble arises wholly from interference with the flow through the arteries, and not at all with the returning blood through the veins. The flow in the veins of the legs may be obstructed for weeks at a time, with a result that both legs will be greatly swollen with dropsy; but when the cause is removed the dropsy is all absorbed, and the tissues soon prove to be in as normal a condition as ever.

"Quite otherwise is it with obstruction in the arteries. Conheim showed that tying the arteries of a rabbit's ear so that no blood passed through them for two weeks was followed by violent inflammation and disorganization of the tissues of the ear when the ligature was loosened. A remarkable provision is therefore made in the body for regulating the flow of arterial blood. Without that provision our bodily lives would quickly come to an end.

"For example, when the stomach is digesting food it requires nine times as much blood as when it is empty—in other words, there must be some mechanism which allows its arteries to dilate while it contains food and then to have them contract when it is empty.

"A deer when it is feeding dies instantly if shot through the stomach, but it may run for miles if shot there when the stomach is empty. All this arterial regulation is under a special division of the nervous system, called the vasomotor nerves. These nerves ramify upon the coats of the smaller arteries, and stimulation of these nerves will cause the arteries to contract so that they are scarcely visible. On the other hand, if these nerves are cut, the arteries then relax to their fullest extent, and it is therefore a study of the laws of the distribution of the vasomotor nerves which affords us the first clue to the problem of 'catching cold.'

"Thus, one of the laws of vasomotor association is that the arterial circulation of all organs in symmetrical pairs is so adjusted that what happens in one of the pairs is reflected through the vasomotor nerves to produce exactly the same result in the other pair. Thus it is easy to see the pulsation of the arteries in the translucent ear of a rabbit, but those arteries at once disappear if the other ear be pinched. Injury of one eye is often followed by the most serious results in the other eye.

"I once took advantage of this law when a boy put a pistol shot through the palm of his hand. The bullet severed the palmar arterial arch, which is supplied by the radial artery coming from the thumb side and by the ulnar artery coming from the opposite side of the wrist. It was necessary, therefore, to tie both ends of the severed palmar arch, but it was difficult to find these wounded vessels on account of the steady hemorrhage which was taking place.

"I accordingly had the other hand dipped in ice water, and the hemorrhage was immediately checked enough for me to find the wounded vessels without trouble.

"If two thermometers be put in the armpits, and a third thermometer be held in the left hand, then plunging the right hand into ice water will cause the thermometer in the left hand to fall from 2 to 5 degrees, while the thermometers in the armpits are not affected. This law, however, applies only to the organs in symmetrical pairs, such as the two hands, the two ears, the two eyes, and the two feet, but does not apply to pair organs which are not symmetrical, such as the two lungs and the two kidneys.

"But another important law is that the vasomotor nerves supplying the skin are always associated with the vasomotor nerves supplying organs or tissues underneath that part of the skin. This law explains the whole subject of surface applications.

"A poultice, for example, is always sedative in its effects, and relieves internal pain not because the poultice strikes clear through into the pleura or inflamed lung, but acts only on the vasomotor association between the outer and inner parts. Hence we may stimulate, as well as depress, by this association.

"A blister or dry cupping is actively stimulating, and thus may be very useful to clear away venous congestion following inflammation, but should not be used during the active determination of blood to a part at the onset of an inflammation.

"But the obverse of this association is still more important to remember. Every inflammation of an internal organ causes the vasomotor nerves of the skin over that organ to be in a highly sensitive condition, so that the internal inflammation may be much aggravated by neglect to protect that part of the skin. This is particularly illustrated in inflammations of the heart, which may be made much worse by having the skin over the heart exposed to the cold. I have often detected the beginning of consumption in the apex of one lung by the application of a cold hand causing the patient immediately to cough when laid over the affected side.

"Besides these laws of vasomotor association there are other important associations which are special between widely separated parts. Thus, the feet are closely associated with two important regions. The first of these is with the circulation of the organs within the pelvis. No one who has inflammation of the bladder or a condition of chronic dysentery ought to get his feet wet lest he thereby aggravate the symptoms due to these disorders.

"The second important association of the feet is with the circulation of the throat. Local chills of the feet may be quickly followed by an attack of sore throat, which extends to the larynx, producing hoarseness, and then may proceed down the windpipe to the bronchial tubes, thus causing bronchitis.

"Still another important association is between the nerves arising at the nape of the neck and the whole artificial circulation of the head and face—in fact, we may say that at the nape of the neck is the chief executive office which presides over the whole circulation above the diaphragm, including, of course, the circulation of the mucous membranes.

"One domestic remedy, for example, was to check nosebleed in a child by slipping a cold key down the back of its neck. How local the primary excitation may be is shown by results of exposing the back of the neck to a cold draught of air. The most extensive inflammation of mucous membranes may result from a prolonged exposure there, though the rest of the body may be warmly clad. Nasal catarrh, which is an inflammation of the mucous membranes of the nose, or, in fact, catarrh of the whole respiratory tract, may soon follow exposing the back of the neck to a cold draught of air.

"These vasomotor associations have their widest illustrations in the causation and course of bronchitis. Sometimes getting the feet wet begins, as we have explained, a cold, which first makes the voice hoarse, and then from the larynx proceeds steadily downward the trachea and larger bronchi until the smaller air tubes become involved.

"Oftener than that, however, the vasomotor centers at the nape of the neck, as we have just said, set up a catarrhal inflammation of the nasal passages, and then with this derangement in the beginning of the breathing apparatus, it progressively invades the whole respiratory tract.

"But what I wish particularly to explain here is the mechanism of the many fatal complications of bronchitis.

"To begin with the disasters which follow upon the plugging of a main bronchus by the accidental lodgment in it of a foreign body. If this be not removed, death inevitably ensues from a most disorganizing pneumatic process of the part supplied by the bronchus, in which are not only all the air vesicles wholly destroyed, which they are not in croupous pneumonia, but the interlocular, as well as the intervesicular connective framework, is rapidly damaged. No ruin of pulmonary tissue compares with this for completeness.

"Now, it should be borne in mind that both the larger and the smaller bronchi should never contain anything but air. Their walls are simply moistened by a bland, slightly saline fluid, and in no part of the body is the saying more true that no mucous membrane should ever secrete mucus. When, instead, its surface is coated with mucus, it is already in a morbid condition, denoting inflammation.

"In the bronchi this is doubly true, for secretions there, no matter how fluid, are to all intents and purposes foreign bodies, and must be got rid of. If they can not be got rid of, the part supplied by that bronchus is subject to the same disorganization as that described following the plugging of a main bronchus. It is then that we have a localized, but ruinous, broncho-pneumonia, however small its area may be.

"Broncho-pneumonia, therefore, occurs in every disease accompanied by bronchitis whenever, as in children, the powers of expectoration are feeble, particularly in measles and whooping cough, and is the most common cause of death in all such affections. But its initial mechanical cause should not be lost sight of, the practical aim always being to make the secretions so fluid that they can be easily coughed away. In adults this is usually accomplished with ease. In infants, as already explained, the immediate results are very serious. The small, occluded bronchi now lead to the same disorganizing process in the little lobules supplied by the bronchus, which occurs as the result above described accompanying occlusion of a main bronchus. Scattered pneumonic processes are therefore found through both lungs, for bronchitis, unlike croupous pneumonia, is a bilateral affection.

"In some cases, however, the plug in a small bronchus may act as a valve, interfering with the inspiration, but not with the expiration, thus leading to atelactasis or collapse of the lobule, so that in broncho-pneumonia we find both pneumonic consolidation of lobules along with collapsed lobules, either condition, of course, equally interfering with the breathing.

"In infants, therefore, this whole process leads to most distressing efforts to get air. The little patients toss from side to side in their vain endeavors to breath until signs of carbonic acid poisoning show the last effects of gradual suffocation; but we meet with practically the same conditions in aged patients from their feeble powers to expectorate.

"Remembering, however, the purely mechanical operation of their respiratory obstruction, I once had an old lady 84 years old, mother of a prominent New York judge, raised feet upward by her nurses, while her head touched the floor, and while in this position I assisted her expectoration by pressure on the sides of the thorax during expiration. She thus got rid of large quantities of mucus and was soon restored to bed quite comfortable, ultimately recovering.

"In no disorder of the lungs does the morbid condition so facilitate infection by every variety of microorganism, including tuberculosis, a not uncommon sequel, especially after measles.

"This subject finally brings us to an important fact connected with catching cold, and that is that catching cold exposes us to every variety of microbic infections.

"Thus the outer skin everywhere swarms with microbes, which are the dread of the surgeon. On that account he does not dare to make the smallest incision through the skin without first disinfecting it by every antiseptic measure in his power. So long as the skin is intact these deadly microbes can not do anything, but just so is it with the inner skin or mucous membrane, which lines the tubes and cavities of the body.

"Thus, the mouths of healthy persons contain for a lifetime that deadly pneumococcus which carries off so many persons when it attacks the lungs with pneumonia. But this microbe can do nothing so long as the mucous membrane is protected by its carefully laid pavement of what are called epithelial cells.

"But let any portion of that mucous membrane be damaged by the shutting off of the cells from their arterial blood through the means of a cold caught either from the feet or nape of the neck, as above described, and the way is then opened for the infecting microbe to enter. The majority of infections, in fact, occur through the mucous surfaces whose epethelium has been damaged in the way described.

"Treatment. The various conditions above reviewed afford many indications for treatment. Thus chronic nasal catarrhs point to a weakened susceptibility of the vasomotor centers at the nape of the neck. Now, nothing so restores the tone of these weakened centers as cold properly applied. Thus a cold bath or shower bath invigorates the circulation, provided always that the reaction from the impression of cold is complete, but if no or equally imperfect reaction occurs the patient is worse off than ever; hence, chronic nasal catarrhs are best treated by sudden and very brief douching of the back of the neck with cold water, to be followed by active dry friction to assist or to promote the restoration of the circulation in the parts. During the douche the hair should be carefully protected from the water, for wet hair would only prolong the injurious effect of chill. Meanwhile the nose itself may be treated with insufflation of a fine powder composed of 2 drams of subcarbonate of bismuth with 6 grains of aristol.

"Bearing in mind what we have said about internal inflammation causing hyperesthesia or great sensitiveness of the corresponding area of skin over the seat of the inflammation, any area of chronic inflammation should have the corresponding cutaneous surface carefully protected. In health, if a cold hand suddenly be placed over the precordium, the heart will give a bound, but so all cases of heart trouble, whether the result of pericarditis or endocarditis, are very sensitive to surface impressions, which would not normally be felt. This explains the beneficial results following applications of large belladonna plasters, which should cover the whole area of the skin over the heart, but these facts are equally applicable in all chronic inflammatory conditions, whether of the lungs or of the pleura. Chest protectors on that account are reasonable. I prefer the application of cotton batting to any other such measure.

"Similarly every patient with chronic diarrhea should have the abdomen covered by some equivalent protection. In chronic, long-standing bronchitis I have the patients wear both shirts and drawers made with perforated chamois skin, worn just over a light undergarment. I have often been told by such patients that they could spend their winters at home, when before they used these protections to the skin they were unable to do so.

"Osler says in his Practice of Medicine:

"Thus, in the convalescence from measles and whooping cough it is very important that the child should not be exposed to the cold, particularly at night, when the temperature of the room naturally falls. In a nocturnal visit to the nursery—sometimes, too, I am sorry to say, to a children's hospital—how often one sees children almost naked, having kicked aside the bedclothes and having the night clothes up about the arms.

"In my practice I have all such children while tossing about, struggling for breath, and thus exposing themselves, put into bags of canton flannel, drawn about the neck so as to prevent them from exposing the skin to the cold air."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], a member of the committee.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up perhaps all of that time. I recognize the universal desire to make progress on our bill. My chief purpose in rising, however, is to refer to the apparent political line that seems to be forming in matters of the Navy. I say "apparent," because I believe that time will demonstrate that there will be no such real line of division. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] is alarmed unduly, and his alarm is premature. This Congress is not yet complete. After so many years of extravagant Republican rule it was a perfectly legitimate desire on the part of the Democratic Party to put a brake upon expenditures in the early days of this Congress. It is not too late after the ends of retrenchment have been met for that party to express itself finally upon the subject of battleships before this Congress is over. An adequate Navy is not copyrighted by the Republican Party. On the contrary, it is a plank in the Democratic platform at Denver in 1908. That plank reads:

The Navy: The constitutional provision that a Navy shall be provided and maintained means an adequate Navy, and we believe that the interests of this country would be best served by having a Navy sufficient to defend the coasts of this country and protect American citizens wherever their rights may be in jeopardy.

There never has been a stronger naval plank in any platform of any party since this Government began.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. Would I be impertinent if I should ask the gentleman if it was not largely through the gentleman's energetic efforts that that plank was inserted in that platform?

Mr. HOBSON. I am glad to be able to say, gentlemen, that I had the privilege of appearing before the resolutions committee at Denver and found a very cordial reception on the part of its members to the suggestions I ventured to advance. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, an examination of the past records of our Navy supplies no warrant for the Republican Party to claim to be the father and the sponsor for the new Navy. On the contrary, the fact is that the Democratic Party has equal, if not superior, claims to this distinction. Secretary Chandler, Republican, has been mentioned in this connection. Secretaries Whitney and Herbert do not take second place to any Secretary who ever held the office.

The appropriations for the Navy made under the Democratic administrations show that the Democratic Party not only took no backward step, but made great progress in naval development. When the Democratic administration came into power under Mr. Cleveland in 1885 the appropriations for the Navy increased from $15,000,000 in 1884 to $16,000,000 the next year; they then went to $17,000,000, and in 1888 reached the high-water mark, for those days, of $25,000,000. [Applause.] Again, turn to the second administration of Mr. Cleveland and you will find that in 1893 the appropriations for the Navy increased from $21,000,000 the previous year to over twenty-two and a half million dollars, and in 1894 went up to $29,000,000, and in 1895 to $31,000,000, and in 1896 attained again the high-water mark for those days of $33,000,000, showing that the Democratic Party has been consistently progressive in its policy toward the Navy. Moreover, it has incorporated reforms in administration and has been constructive in its treatment of this great branch of national defense.

Furthermore, the control of the Naval Committee by the Democratic Party is going to mark a beginning of new and much-needed reforms and the adoption of many constructive measures, not only to cut down the expenses but to promote the efficiency of the service, the efficiency of administration, the efficiency of organization, the efficiency of the personnel, and the general efficiency of the Navy as our main reliance for national defense.

Take the question of types of battleships. It is a legitimate criticism that to-day we have not a single modern scout vessel. These Dreadnought cruisers are the only form of modern scouts that can occupy the sea. No auxiliary can remain upon the sea in the face of those, and yet there has not been under a Republican administration a serious effort to get such vessels as these. Furthermore, the question of the type of shell to use has been long neglected, and we are to-day behind all the rest of the world. It has been hard work to get a Republican administration to make even the simplest experiments in this important line of naval progress. Under Democratic control of the committee we now have a special subcommittee to take up with the Navy Department the question of experiments, and are in a fair way to determine the best methods of attack and provide against the expenditure of money for ineffective matériel. We have taken up the question of the reorganization of the navy yards and Navy Department and of the personnel. It is not only not warranted, but exceedingly unwise in either side to try to make a political matter out of this vital question. Every Democrat, like every Republican, recognizes the elemental principle of self-preservation, and all join together in providing for national defense.

When it came to the question of the Spanish War, was there any difference of party? No. Was there in any other foreign war? No. And there never will be. In my judgment, the Democratic Party will soon be in control of the Executive administration of the Government as well as in control of Congress, and it can be relied on to meet effectively and wisely all the responsibilities that come, including proper provision for and administration of the Navy and all other branches of the national defense. American institutions are built up upon the great Democratic principle of equality of opportunity for all and special privilege for none. This principle is the foundation for the civilization of the future to rest upon. It is absurd, on the face of it, to think that the party that embodies this principle would see it pushed backward by the nations of the Old World whose Governments are built upon the hereditary principle and the claims of privilege. On the contrary, the Democratic Party of all others can be depended on to advance that principle year by year, and to provide for its defense against assault. Take the Monroe doctrine established by our forefathers.

The Monroe doctrine is in effect an announcement that this hemisphere shall not be seized by any foreign power for special advantage. It does not restrict legitimate development or even colonization in the sense of sending citizens there, but it forbids the seizing and control of any part of it by a military power that would hoist its flag and assume special privilege there. You do not expect the Democratic Party, that stands for that principle—the party that announced and inaugurated the Monroe doctrine—to give up the Monroe doctrine. On the contrary, it can be counted on, as in the case of President Cleveland, to protect that doctrine with jealous care. When we examine the means for maintaining that doctrine it will be evident to those who have the responsibility that the only way for our ideas to prevail in a land beyond the sea as against the ideas of another nation in the same land likewise beyond the sea from them will be for us to control the sea.

Our liberal and generous policies in Cuba would have been accepted if we had held control of the sea as compared with Spain, and there would have been no war with Spain. The problems there would have been settled by diplomacy.

When Germany landed in Venezuela, we called upon her to retire. Why did she retire peacefully? Because we had control of the sea. It being clear that control of the sea is necessary to maintain the Monroe doctrine, the Democratic Party can be counted upon to establish that control.

Furthermore, we are now approaching the completion of the Panama Canal. Not only the Monroe doctrine but the Pacific Ocean in general will receive more careful consideration at the hands of the whole world, and especially at the hands of the American people and their representatives in both parties. Across the great Pacific Ocean Americans to-day maintain, or assume to maintain, the principle of the open-door policy. That is nothing more than the old Democratic principle of equality of opportunity in the commercial relations of nations with the neutral markets of the world. We are the real sponsor, and upon us must depend the real effectiveness of that policy. Of course, the Democratic Party and the Democratic statesmen in control of its policies must recognize that the only basis upon which that policy can be maintained and made effective is a strong naval force in the Pacific Ocean—substantially control of the sea as against any nation of Asia.

In the middle of the Pacific, at Pearl Harbor, near Honolulu, we have the most vital strategic point in the world. That harbor will control 4,000 miles of that ocean, practically the ocean itself. The nation which ultimately controls Pearl Harbor will direct the policies and future of that great ocean.

America now owns that harbor. Other nations desire it. One other nation has 35,000 troops in that island by official report. The permanent control of that harbor depends absolutely on the control of the sea. The nation that has free access to that island, so that its reenforcements can go over while it can cut off the sending of reenforcements from other lands, will of necessity control that strategic center. Democrats in responsibility will be just as alive to their vital interest as men of any other party.

Again, it is not necessary to discuss how we came into possession of the Philippine Islands. We all know we have a responsibility resting upon us in connection with the future destiny of those people. We would not allow peoples in South America to have their destiny determined by a great military power of another continent.

Do you think we would leave the destiny of the Filipinos, now in the hollow of our hands, to be settled by the foreign colonial policies of any monarch? America certainly would not, and least of all would the Democratic Party. Evidently we can only maintain our protection and assume the inalienable responsibility by having free access to those islands, which means control of the sea in the Pacific. In view of these considerations we can rest assured that a constructive party like the Democratic Party will proceed to develop the proper naval policy to protect these vital interests and insure the effectiveness of these fundamental Democratic principles.

Mr. Chairman, may I ask how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. HOBSON. In conclusion I wish to call attention to the fact that our committee, with its Democratic majority, is now taking up the whole question of national defense on a broader scale than ever before considered in America, and has reported a measure which will create a council of national defense. The President will be at the head of the council, and on it will be the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and eight Members of Congress, the chairmen of the great committees involved in national defense—the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses, the Committees on Foreign Affairs of the two Houses, the Naval and Military Committees of the two Houses, and four experts—the Chief of the General Staff of the Army, the president of the Army War College, the officer of the Navy corresponding as nearly as practicable to the Chief of Staff, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and the president of the Naval War College. These are to be a council of national defense, to investigate thoroughly the whole question and formulate our general policy, and to recommend to Congress from time to time such measures as they deem expedient for the carrying out of that policy.

Every nation of the world of any importance in military affairs, where the question of national defense has been given serious consideration, has evolved some such council in some form. Recent wars have shown the increasing necessity for well-defined policy as the magnitude of war operations grow. In the war between Japan and Russia, Russia's council did not bring closely together the civil and military, and the civil permitted the war to be brought on before the military was ready. Then, again, the civil allowed the war to be terminated before the military was ready. The result of the war was adverse to Russia. If there had been that intimate connection in their administration between the civil and the military that there will be in our council they would have proceeded together. The war would have been delayed in coming on, and would have been extended in its prosecution; and the experts of the world believe the issue of the war would have been victory, instead of defeat, to Russia.

Following upon the heels of the Japanese-Russian war, the Russian Government strengthened and solidified their council of national defense.

The same happened with the English council in the prosecution of the Boer war. That war gave the British a great deal of trouble because the civil brought it on before the military was ready. Since then they have developed their council of defense along the lines I have indicated.

A study of the organization of the German Government and its defense policies goes to show that the great success achieved in recent years by the German arms is due to the fact that they have had complete cooperation between the civil and military branches. The lesson of history brings out the fact that the successful policies in war and successful foreign policies pursued without war have been the result of thorough cooperation of civil and military administrations. The Democratic Party in establishing this council will inaugurate a new era of economy and efficiency in the national defense——

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HOBSON. I do.

Mr. HILL. I do not know much about naval affairs, but I wish to ask this question: Did the committee, in reporting this bill and ignoring the recommendation of the Navy Department for two battleships and two cruisers, do it with the idea that the present Navy, if maintained in its present condition, is sufficient for the defense of the country, or do they do it as a matter of temporary economy and propose to have the country take its chances on the defense?

Mr. HOBSON. I will answer, though the chairman of the committee is better able to interpret the party policies, if the gentleman asks me what my idea of it is. The party, and the committee reflecting that party, have simply called a temporary halt for purposes of investigation. The party seeks economy, but not a false economy that would sacrifice efficiency—this session is not completed yet—in the matter of battleships.

Mr. HILL. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman one more question, and that is, whether, in his judgment, that is a safe course of procedure?

Mr. HOBSON. I am frank to tell the gentleman, as I tell everybody who asks me about it and as I tell the public at large, that in my judgment the only policy that will maintain the Monroe doctrine in peace is to have control of the sea as compared with any nation that might attempt to colonize. The same situation holds true in the Pacific, and our Navy ought to be of such strength that our fleet in the Atlantic would be on a parity with any continental nation of Europe, while our fleet in the Pacific would be on a parity with any power of Asia; that is, our Atlantic Fleet should equal the German fleet and our Pacific Fleet should equal the Japanese fleet.

Mr. HILL. I do not refer to size as an instrument of offense. I am asking the gentleman's judgment as to whether, if the Navy is maintained in its present condition, it is sufficiently large to be a sure defense?

Mr. HOBSON. I am frank to tell the gentleman that it certainly will not be. At our present rate we will not be a second-class power long, but will rapidly fall to the rank of a fifth-class power. It would require more than four battleships a year to maintain a position as a second-rate power. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, in my home State of North Carolina the 10th day of May in each year is set apart as a memorial day, on which the men and women gather in their respective communities to do honor to the living ex-Confederate veterans and to recall the virtues and the heroism of those who gave up their lives in the great Civil War. It is a day which evokes tender and grateful memories of that fratricidal strife, and for the larger number of those who participated the event is only a matter of history. We of the South find nothing inconsistent or unpatriotic in preserving the memory and recalling the courage and virtues of the men who wore the gray. To those of us who have no personal recollection of that great war we feel that we would be unworthy sons of those brave men if we forgot their virtues or ceased to be proud of the record which they made in a cause which they believed to be right. For all time to come their deeds and their achievements as men will make a bright page in history and add distinction to our country.

No brave soldier who followed Grant will deny this privilege or disparage the courage and manhood of his former foes. We are all American citizens, and as we of the South honor the brave men who fought to preserve the Union, so will all good men upon the other side and their descendants continue to honor the brave men who followed Lee and Jackson.

I was at my home in the town of Washington, N. C., on the 10th day of May this year and participated in the memorial exercises. The Daughters of the Confederacy joined with the veterans and the citizens in this sweet memorial. Under a bright sun, with a gentle breeze, the old and decrepit veterans marched with stirring music and accompanied by citizens and children. The exercises were held in the auditorium of the public-school building, where, as a part of the program, an address was delivered by Mr. R. D. W. Connor, of Raleigh, N. C. Mr. Connor is a young man of only 35 years, but he has accomplished much. He is the secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission, secretary of the State Teachers' Assembly, and a leading member of the North Carolina Literary and Historical Association. He is a student and writer upon historical subjects and has contributed much toward preserving the history of the State and the country. His address was couched in such chaste language, was so replete with historical facts, and with all was so appropriate and patriotic that I resolved, after its delivery, to request a copy of the address with a view of asking the leave of the House to publish the same in the RECORD. It was an address which might have been delivered before any Grand Army post or before any audience in any State of the Union, regardless of their attitude or the attitude of their ancestors in that great conflict. Like myself, Mr. Connor belongs to the new generation who did not participate in the Civil War. The people of my State are proud of the Republic, loyal to the Constitution and the Union of the States, and have no higher ideal than the preservation of that Union for all time to come. If this speech could be read by the people of every section I believe it would contribute to cementing the ties which should bind us in one common patriotic purpose to preserve our Government, to perpetuate its institutions, and to maintain fraternity among all sections. If I am permitted to insert this speech in the RECORD it is my purpose to distribute it as far as possible in other sections, and particularly among the veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic.

I therefore ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to append as a part of my remarks the address of Mr. R. D. W. Connor, of North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address referred to is as follows:

THE MEANING AND PURPOSE OF MEMORIAL DAY.

"Forty-nine years ago to-day the spirit of Stonewall Jackson passed over the river and rested in the shade of the trees. The flight of that heroic soul marked the 10th day of May as an anniversary to be forever hallowed in the grateful heart of the South. For in the career of Stonewall Jackson, more perfectly than in the career of any other man, was personified the Southern Confederacy. As the Confederacy by one bold stroke rose to a place among the powers of the world, so Stonewall Jackson at one bound leaped from obscurity to a place among the immortals of history. The Confederacy, in a brief spasm of glory, astounded the world by the brilliancy of its achievements, and Stonewall Jackson, like a passing meteor across the dark clouds of war, dazzled the eyes of mankind by the brilliancy of his genius; and as the English poet declared of the Confederacy—

"No nation rose so white and fair,
Or fell so pure of crime.

"So Stonewall Jackson, like a stainless knight of chivalry, rose to a place among heroes and, facing death with inspired heroism, left to fame a name untarnished by a single blot. In him, too, we find personified those qualities of fearless courage, dashing enthusiasm, and steadfast loyalty that characterized the soldiers of the South and won for them in defeat laurels as splendid as those that crowned the brows of their foes in victory. Nothing, therefore, could be more fitting than that the daughters of the South, searching the calendar for a day to consecrate to the memory of the Confederacy, should select the anniversary of the day on which Stonewall Jackson gave his life in defence of their homes and firesides.

"It is, then, in memory of this hero and of those who followed him that, in the very midst of an age inspired by the spirit of a living present, and cheered with the hopefulness of those who have learned to fight and win, we pause to-day to commune for a brief moment with a past that is dead, and to pay tribute to the memory of those who fought and lost. Truly a paradoxical situation. And yet, perhaps not so very paradoxical after all, for these memorial day ceremonies have a much deeper meaning than may at first appear. The past is dead, and yet it lives; our fathers lost, and yet they won; and to-day we come to review not the dead, but the living past; to commemorate not the defeat, but the victory of the vanquished. Looking back over the past we see in the American Civil War, underneath all the blare of bugles and the roar of cannon, the conflict of two great ideas. Behind the Stars and Stripes of Lincoln and Grant, we see arrayed the idea of nationality; behind the Stars and Bars of Davis and Lee, the idea of sovereign statehood. Looking out into the future, we see the day when the historian, coming to pronounce his judgment on the final results of that conflict, will declare that in the end both ideas were triumphant, for out of that struggle came a more perfect and more enduring Union, and out of it came a freer and a nobler State. Now, happily no longer in conflict, State and Union move along their destined paths to a common heritage of liberty and truth and justice for all mankind. In this happy consummation both Federal and Confederate have their allotted parts to play.

"The Confederate soldier, as I have said, represented the idea of sovereign Statehood. In defense of this idea thousands of men died on the field of battle, and for it to-day other thousands rejoice in an opportunity to live. What then is this thing for which men are so willing to give their lives? What do we mean by the State? By the State I mean something more than acres of land and millions of people; something more than constitutions and laws, than governors and legislatures, than courts and constables and prisons. I mean something more than material wealth and political power. The State of North Carolina is not the 52,000 square miles of territory lying between Virginia and South Carolina, the Atlantic and the Blue Ridge; nor is it the two and a half millions of people whose homes are here. The State is not to be found in the capitol at Raleigh, nor in the courthouses of our 100 counties. Soil and climate, fields and forests, rivers and mountains, railroads and factories, cottages and mansions, schools and churches—all these are but outward and visible forms of the real, living State. The first white men who settled on our shores 300 years ago found the same 52,000 square miles of territory stretching out before them; the same rivers pouring their waters into the same sea; the same mountain ranges lifting their lofty peaks up into the same blue sky; the same smiling plains and the same rolling hills presented to their view the same panorama of natural beauty and grandeur. They found forests growing then as they grow now. They cleared fields and built houses. They, too, had a constitution and laws, a governor, and a lawmaking body. All these things they had in substance as we have them to-day. They had the possibilities of a State, but they did not have the State itself, and certainly they did not have the State of North Carolina to which we acknowledge allegiance. If these things constituted the real State, it would be but a dead thing, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

"But the State is not a dead thing. It is a living, breathing, changing organism, never to-day what it was yesterday, and never to be to-morrow what it is to-day. The State of 1912 is not the State of 1812. Every generation in the past has added its contributions, modifying its character and changing its ideals; and every generation in the future must contribute something for good or ill. As Dr. McIver used to say: 'Sometimes we think it is a pity that a good man who has learned to be of service to his fellows should be called out of the world.' So sometimes we may think about an enterprising and useful generation, but after all the generations of men are but relays in civilization's march on its journey from savagery to the millennium. Each generation owes it to the past and to the future that no previous worthy attainment or achievement, whether of thought or deed or vision, shall be lost. It is also under the highest obligation to make at least as much progress on the march as has been made by any generation that has gone before. It is then in the contributions of all the generations that have gone before us, and in the contributions that we are to-day making to the generations that shall come after us that we find the real, living State.

"Let us suppose that it were possible to blot out of our lives all the story of the past, to erase from our memories all recollection of the men and events, the thoughts and the ideals, that have made us what we are to-day, to lose all knowledge of our forefathers' conceptions of liberty and law, all their successes and failures, their hopes and ambitions, their customs, traditions, and history—suppose all these things were torn out of our annals, what would we have left of the State which our Revolutionary ancestors founded and handed down to us? If we had never seen the gallant Wyatt rushing to his death at Bethel; if we had never watched with speechless wonder and admiration the long gray line of Pettigrew's division sweeping up the heights of Gettysburg; if we had never beheld the splendid figure of the gallant Grimes leading the last desperate charge at Appomattox, would we still have the same glorious old North State which we have now? Robert E. Lee, sitting despondently amid the ruins of his noble army, as his soldiers straggled by on the retreat from Petersburg, without order and without discipline, was suddenly aroused from his reverie by the steady, disciplined tread of a brigade keeping perfect step to the drumbeat. Quickly raising his head, while a pleased smile chased shadows of despondency from his face, he asked, 'What brigade is that?' 'Cox's North Carolina,' was the reply. Then, lifting his hat in salute, the great commander exclaimed, with deep emotion, 'God bless old North Carolina.' Blot all of these memories out of our lives and what should we have left? The same vast stretch of territory would still throw itself across the continent for a distance of 500 miles, the same plains and hills and plateaus would still delight the eye with their varied beauty, the same lofty mountain peaks would still cast their dark shadows across the same deep valleys, the same sky would still bend its blue arch above us, but in it all we should behold but a vain, hollow, empty shell of dead materialism, and not that State for which the Confederate soldier offered his life on the field of battle and which we to-day delight to love and serve. That State, ladies and gentlemen, we find in the hearts and minds of her people; in all they have been in the past, in all they are in the present, and in all they hope to be in the future; in the memories of the men and events by which, in peace and in war, in the council chamber and on the battle field, we have won our place among the States of the American Union; in the ideals upon which the State was founded by the fathers and in the aspirations that stir in us an ambition to serve the State and worthily to maintain what they have nobly secured.

"Such was the Confederate soldier's conception of the State, and as it was his duty and privilege to defend it, so it is ours to preserve and hand it down unimpaired to his children forever. For this purpose, then, that we may the better fulfill this duty, we have set apart this memorial day in order that we may annually pass in review what the State has been in the past, consider what it is in the present, and forecast what we shall make it in the future.

"The first purpose of memorial day, then, is to keep fresh in our minds what the State has been in the past, and surely it would be hard for one who loves his State to find a more important or a more pleasing task. A generation ago it was a favorite boast with us in the South that we had been too busy making history to have time for writing it. But when we come to think of the State as the Confederate soldier thought of it, we shall understand that not only is each generation under obligation to make at least as much progress on the march of civilization as any generation that has gone before, but it is also under equal obligations to preserve the record of its progress for the benefit of generations that shall come after it; for as history is the foundation of all knowledge and the measure of all progress, so a failure to record the great events of history would result in setting each generation back to the point from which its predecessor started, and would close to posterity the source of its richest treasures. Modesty, no doubt, is a commendable trait in the character of any people, but a sober, reasonable, and intelligent pride in the achievements of one's country is the best incentive to public virtue and real patriotism; and a people who have not the pride to record their history will not long have the virtue to make history that is worth recording.

"But I speak now of a State pride that is sober, reasonable and intelligent, for certainly there is nothing either patriotic or elevating in that foolish, extravagant, and ignorant pride that provoked Kipling's famous prayer:

"If, drunk with sight of power, we loose
Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe—
Such boastings as the Gentiles use,
Or lesser breeds without the law—
* * * * *
For frantic boast and foolish word,
Thy mercy on Thy people, Lord!

"Such a pride develops neither virtue nor patriotism. It only excites the ridicule of the world and brings shame on the good name of the State. It places false values on unworthy things and degrades the character of the people. It produces self-conceit, provincialism, and stagnation, and destroys manly vigor and ambition. It is to be avoided as the worst enemy of true State pride. Rather let us use memorial day to cultivate a sober pride of country, which knows how to hold itself in proper reserve, yet ever stands guard over the true honor and welfare of the State; a reasonable pride of country, which knows the difference between the good and the evil, the true and the false, the beautiful and the ugly in the life of the State, and will accept the one but reject the other; an intelligent pride of country, which will seek to draw from the past lessons of service and inspiration for the present and the future.

"Love thou thy land, with love far-brought
From out the storied past, and used
Within the present, but transfused
Thro' future time by power of thought.

"The importance of the cultivation of such a pride among a self-governing people in the achievements of their country can not be easily overestimated. The great events in the history of a democratic country are the achievements of the people themselves. The Czar of Russia may issue his decree granting a free Parliament to his subjects and is entitled to claim all the credit and the glory as his own; but when an American Congress promulgates a Declaration of Independence or an American President emancipates 3,000,000 slaves, it is not Congress nor the President, but the people themselves, who speak. The American soldier, whether he wore the blue or whether he wore the gray, who answered the call of his country in 1861 and through four long years of war wrote his unsurpassed record of devotion to duty, of courage in the field, of endurance in suffering, of patience in defeat, of fidelity in temptation, of loyalty in the hour of trial, won for himself a place in history beside the imperial legionary of Cæsar and the old guardsman of Napoleon; but the glory of the Roman legionary and the glory of the French guardsman belong to them alone, the glory of the American soldier belongs to his country. So, too, the great men in a republic of self-governing people spring from among the people themselves, and in a republic no man is counted great by the accident of birth, but only by reason of some eminent service rendered to his fellow countrymen. Every man feels, therefore, that what other men have been and done, he himself may be and do. The fame of a Hannibal or a Cæsar, or of a Frederick or a Napoleon, is his own; but the fame of Lee and Grant, of Lincoln and Davis and Vance belongs to the American people. When we turn aside from our daily affairs, therefore, to commemorate the great events in our history, we simply take an inventory of the best that we ourselves have been able to contribute to the making of the State; and when we offer tribute to the great men of the State, we simply pay tribute to the highest types of character that we ourselves have been able to develop, for our own character is reflected in the character of the men whose memories we revere, whose lives we study, and whose virtues we admire.

"This, then, is the meaning of memorial day as it relates to the State of the past; for the State of the present it has a yet deeper meaning. From this study of our contributions to the State of the past we shall draw experience and inspiration for our contributions to the State of the present, for in a free State not only the demands of patriotism but also the qualifications of good citizenship require that those who control and direct the affairs of the State shall be familiar with the ideas and events that have shaped its destiny. In such a State every citizen is a director in its affairs and from time to time is called upon to decide great questions that will affect the welfare of the remotest posterity. In his hands he holds the fate of political parties; he controls public polices; he formulates social creeds; he solves educational problems; he determines great industrial issues; in a word, he forms public opinion, and in free States public opinion rules politicians, governs social conduct, regulates industrial affairs, and shapes the destinies of the people. This much at least every citizen must pay for the privilege of his citizenship; and if he is a patriotic citizen, intent upon the conscientious performance of his duty, he needs as the foundation stone of his citizenship a knowledge of the past.

"Oh, but men say, 'The past is dead, and we are practical men who live in the present. What need have we for the dead past?' The past is not dead. 'The roots of the present lie deep in the past, and nothing in the past is dead to the man who would understand how the present came to be what it is.' The present was born of the past and is the parent of the future. Every problem which you are called upon to solve comes to you out of the past, molded into shape by its influence and charged with its spirit. If your problem be to choose between candidates for the United States Senate, for governor, for constable, or for any other public office, your first inquiry is for a knowledge of their past. If your problem be to reorganize a bank, a school, a factory, or any other institution, your first task is to learn how the institution was formed and whence it grew. If your problem be to formulate a social creed for the guidance of your community, your first step is to learn what social creeds have risen and vanished before. If your problem be to determine upon an educational policy for your city, your county, or your State, you must first of all investigate the hundred policies that have already been put to the test. If your problem be to agree upon some plan for the better marketing of your cotton crop, for the regulation of labor, or to settle any other industrial policy, you must first of all know the origin and history of the trouble to be corrected. Whatever your problem may be you can not understand it clearly or solve it intelligently until you are familiar with its past.

"And yet how often do we see wise men who refuse to acknowledge this plain truth blundering along in their blindness, consulting their invention and rejecting their experience until they find that every step taken in advance seems to be hurled back by some silent and unnoticed power, and their enthusiasm gives way to despair, their hopes fade into recollections.

"What is this unseen power which seems to undo the best human efforts as if it were some overbearing weight against which no man can struggle? What is this ever-acting force which seems to revive the dead, to restore what we destroy, to renew forgotten watchwords, exploded fallacies, discredited doctrines, and condemned institutions; against which enthusiasm, intellect, truth, high purpose, and self-devotion seem to beat themselves to death in vain? It is the past. It is the accumulated wills and works of all mankind around us and before us. It is civilization. It is that power which to understand is strength, which to repudiate is weakness. (Frederic Harrison: The Meaning of History.)

"Surely no people in all the history of the world have had more reason to be impressed with these truths than we Americans of the Southern States. During the decade following the Civil War we saw a triumphant people, flushed with victory and drunk with power, attempt to remodel every institution of these Southern States in defiance of all the lessons of 10 centuries of English history. We saw them attempt to erect a political structure on a basis that turned back the wheel of time a thousand years. We saw them formulate a social creed proclaiming an equality between the white man and the black man that flew into the face of all civilization. We saw them plan an industrial scheme to place the former master under the feet of his recent slave; that gave the lie to the teachings of history throughout the ages. And we saw them all—institutions, political structure, social ideals, and industrial schemes, though supported by the arms of a victorious Nation, rise in the night only to fall crushed and destroyed in the day, leaving as their contributions to the State naught but the "* * * sword and fire,

Red ruin, and the breaking up of laws.

"Crushed and destroyed, not because they were evil, evil though they were, but destroyed because they were not born of the past. The best work of some of the truest reformers in the history of the world has not been exempt from a similar fate. Indeed, the whole path of civilization is strewn with the wrecks of institutions, social and religious creeds, political and industrial structures, to which millions looked for the cure of all human ills and upon which they founded their hopes of human happiness—wrecked because their roots were not sunk deep in the teachings of the past. The past is the conservative, steadying, guiding power in the present; and the present, without the influence of the past, would be as unsteady in its motions, as helpless to guide its course, and as uncertain of its goal as a ship without sails, ballast, or rudder. No pilot is fit to be intrusted with the control of a ship who is ignorant of his chart, and no crew who are indifferent to their chart need hope to reach their haven safely; so no man is fit to be intrusted with control of the present who is ignorant of the past, and no people who are indifferent to their past need hope to make their future great.

"For this State of the future, memorial day has yet a deeper meaning. Paradoxical as this may seem, it is yet necessarily true. All our aims and ambitions and hopes look to the future. That State pride which the study of the past cultivates is a meaningless vanity if it does not inspire in us high and splendid ideals for the State of the future. That equipment for service which such study develops has but little purpose if it does not enable us the better to realize those ideals. If we shall find that the contributions made by our fathers to the State of the past were good, shall we not resolve that our contributions to the State of the future shall be better? If we shall find that they have left to us a noble heritage, shall we not determine to leave to our children a yet richer legacy? If we shall find that they were ready without thought of self to bear the burdens of the state and equipped to do its service, shall we falter because we, too, have burdens to bear and services to perform? No State ever called her people into her service with greater confidence in their spirit of willingness and determination than North Carolina in 1861, and no people ever responded with a more absolute forgetfulness of self in their duty to their country. In like manner the State of the future is calling us into her service; and shall we not respond in like spirit? No invading foe threatens us with a foreign tyranny, no bugle calls us to arms in her defense; but there are other tyrannies none the less oppressive, other duties none the less important. There is the tyranny of ignorance, the tyranny of poverty, the tyranny of disease, the tyranny of a backward industrial life, the tyranny of prejudice, the tyranny of intolerance. There are schools to be supported, resources to be developed, social conditions to be reformed, fields to be cultivated, prejudices to be overthrown, truth and justice to be established—all great problems that have come to us out of the past. What, then, has the past to teach us with regard to their solution?

"The past will teach us that since the dawn of civilization ignorance has contributed nothing to the progress of mankind or to the amelioration of man's condition on earth; hence we shall learn that the supreme duty of the State of the future is the education of her children—not some of her children, but every child of them, without regard to its sex or condition, its wealth or poverty, its race or color. Ignorance is no respecter of persons. It chooses its agents regardless of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It is thoroughly democratic. It strikes through the ruler in the seat of power; it strikes through the money king on his throne of gold; it strikes through the beggar on the street. It is as blind as justice itself. The scholar in his study, the man with the hoe, the banker, the merchant, the manufacturer, the editor, the teacher the lawyer, the farmer, all feel the deadening effects of its blows, and wherever they fall they leave behind a trail of poverty and failure and suffering. It flaunts itself in our faces to-day with all the arrogance of long-intrenched power, daring us to more terrific battles and inviting us to more glorious victories than any that were ever won by the Confederate soldier. To these battles the State of the future is calling us as the State of the past called to our fathers:

"Bring up all your cohorts of truth and light and power. Open all your batteries and sound the onset, for the conflict is now on with the enemy. The powers of ignorance and of darkness are arrayed against us, and the fight must be to the finish.

"The past will teach us that material resources—unlimited water power, boundless forests, inexhaustible minerals, fertile soil, and genial climate—contribute nothing to the wealth or the power of a people who do not know how to use them. Gettysburg and Appomattox taught this lesson with fearful force, for behind the armies of the South were neglected fields, unopened mines, impassable highways, unexplored forests, and rivers that sent their waters unfettered to the sea; behind the armies of the North were cultivated farms and gardens, rivers that had been harnessed to the spindle and the loom, mines that had been made to yield up their secret treasures, forests that gave their timbers to be fashioned into a thousand useful forms, and great railroads and highways that carried life and vigor to the uttermost parts of the country. In 1865 the armies of Lee and Johnston surrendered not to the armies of Grant and Sherman, who faced them on the fields of Virginia and Carolina, but to the mills and factories that dotted the river banks of New England, to the open mines that poured their riches into the laps of California and Pennsylvania, to the trade and commerce that brought the produce of the world to the doors of New York and Chicago and Philadelphia. History teaches no lesson more forcibly than the lesson that Providence does not long tolerate a people who neglect the gifts of nature. And so in the State of the future, before we can come into our inheritance, we, too, must learn how to go down into the bowels of the earth and bring up the hidden treasures, how to penetrate the depths of the forests and hew down the timbers with foresight and intelligence, how to tunnel the mountains and bridge the gorges for great railroads and highways of commerce and travel. In a word, we must learn how to use the natural wealth that a generous Creator has poured into our laps or become the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for those who do know how to use them.

"The past will teach us that no State ever grew strong or prosperous except through the strength and prosperity of the great toiling masses of its people. Hence we shall learn that in the State of the future the 80 per cent of her people who cultivate her soil and not the 20 per cent who live in her towns will determine her power and wealth. The great economic problem of this State then, as Mr. Poe states it, is not the building of towns and cities but the increasing of the earning capacity of her average farm at least $500 a year so as to bring it up to the earning capacity of the farms in other parts of our country. In order to do this—

"We must rebuild our wasted soils, restore the valuable woods to our forests, construct economic and enduring highways, substitute in the country substantial structures of brick or stone for our frail tenements of wood, the meadows must send their fragrance to the valleys, the fruit trees must cover the hilltops with bloom, the schoolhouse, the church, and the factory must gladden the view from every summit. We must build a more complete and enduring rural civilization, where strong and vigorous manhood is reared and where the purest and rarest forms of womanhood are in bloom. * * * Every idle acre of land must be made to produce, every idle man and woman must be drafted into the army of toil, extravagance and waste must cease, intelligence must dominate matter, and universal vigor must take up the tasks of general frailty. (Seaman A. Knapp in an address before the North Carolina Teachers' Assembly, 1908.)

"Our industrial Lees and Jacksons must lead their armies of toilers against the foes that are beating back from our rural sections the comforts and conveniences and pleasures of modern life.

"The past will teach us that the foundation upon which rests the power and stability of the State is the physical well-being of its people. The battlefield soaked in human blood, strewn with mangled bodies, and groaning from the suffering of its victims, fills us with unspeakable loathing; and, turning away with horror-stricken faces, we cry aloud against 'man's inhumanity to man.' With a thousand voices from every pulpit and press in the land we denounce war as the great crime against civilization, and upon a thousand gilded trumpets we hail the dawn of universal peace as civilization's last and greatest triumph. But if war is a crime against civilization what shall be said of the existence among us of those conditions which produce preventable disease? Where war has claimed its thousands disease has reaped its tens of thousands. During the Civil War, whose heroes we honor to-day, while 19,000 brave North Carolina soldiers fell on the battlefield, disease increased the number to more than 40,000. For every American soldier killed in that struggle by bullets, three fell before the invisible shafts of disease. During the Spanish-American War the common house fly slew five times as many American soldiers as were killed by Spaniards, and in that short and unequal struggle for every American soldier who fell before a Spanish bullet disease slew 14. It matters not how brave the soldier may be, how loyal to his flag, how enthusiastic in his cause, no measure of bravery, no degree of loyalty, no amount of enthusiasm can avail him aught if his body be wasted with disease, if his limbs refuse to obey the demands upon them, if his mind be dulled and deadened by living under insanitary conditions. And what is true of the soldier in war is equally true of the citizen in peace. Rome, once the world's mightiest empire, we are told, was destroyed by malaria. Last year alone in the United States, among the most enlightened people on earth, one single preventable disease destroyed as many persons as were slain on both sides during the four years of our Civil War. No people weak and sickly from living under insanitary conditions can ever make a strong, a prosperous, and a happy community. Though they may dwell in the most beautiful region on earth, though manufactures may prosper, though agriculture may thrive, though the arts and sciences may flourish, though architects may cover the land with gorgeous temples and palaces, though they build navies and raise armies greater than any the world has yet seen, if they do not destroy the conditions that produce disease, disease will take its silent and insidious course, daily undermining the health and decreasing the vigor of the race, and that nation must perish. We shall learn no lesson from the past more vital to our welfare than the lesson that it is the duty of every community to protect the lives and health of its people.

"The past will teach us that the supreme test of capacity of any people for the great task of self-government is the degree of patience with which they are willing to submit to necessary and salutary restraints upon their will in the exercise of political power, and if I do not misread the signs of the times there is no lesson which we need to take to heart just at this time than this: Self-government, if it means anything, means self-restraint, self-restraint in the exercise of political power not merely by individuals, but also by communities, by States, and even by mighty nations. In every self-governing community the well-considered will of the majority of those upon whom political power is conferred must, of course, prevail; but before that majority is fit for the task of self-government it must recognize the fact that there are certain great principles of right, justice, and liberty, fundamental, eternal, and unchanging, which it can not overleap with impunity, and which must always be maintained at every hazard by those in authority. These principles of government our fathers embodied in our State and Federal Constitutions for the protection of the weak against the strong, the minority against the temporary passions of the majority. But to-day there is rapidly developing among us a disposition to regard these restrictions with disfavor, to look upon our constitutions as antiquated documents, very good in their day but now decidedly behind the times; and we are growing more and more impatient with courts and judges who dare uphold their provisions when they conflict with the passing whims of the hour. Looking back over our history, I find that likewise the abolitionists denounced the courts and judges in the days of Chief Justice Taney and the Dred Scott decision; and so, too, did the carpetbaggers and their northern supporters in the days of Chief Justice Chase and the reconstruction acts. I would not to-day say one word that would revive the bitter memories of reconstruction, yet I would not have you soon forget the lessons to be drawn from that memorable epoch in our history. When the majority of the American people, swayed by vindictive passions of sectional hatred, attempted to reduce the whole South to a condition like that of a Roman province under the Cæsars, what great instrument stood in their way?

"The Federal Constitution. When that majority withdrew from southern leaders the benefits of the amnesty granted them by the President, when they forbade southern lawyers to practice in the courts and southern preachers to preach the gospel from their pulpits, when they abolished the right of trial by jury in the South and substituted for it trial by irresponsible military commissions, when they denied to the southern people the privilege of the great writ of habeas corpus, when by these monstrous violations of the Constitution they attempted to withdraw the protection of the law of the land from all those who refused to 'crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift might follow fawning,' who was it that stayed their hands and saved the liberties of the southern people? It was none other than the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Thwarted in their purpose, the majority chafed and stormed, denounced the judges, and threatened to abolish the court, but the good ship Constitution rode clamly through the raging tempest and carried her precious cargo safely into port. And so to-day, when we become impatient at the salutary restraints placed upon our actions by that great charter of our liberties, when we feel inclined to join in the cry of those who condemn it as antiquated and unsuited to the times, when in our eagerness to make 'progress' we are tempted to demand that its time-tested provisions give way to hastily conceived expedients, let us pause—let us pause and call to mind the great part it has played in the establishment of human liberty on earth; let us look about us and consider how it has carried light and hope and inspiration to the teeming millions, not of America only, but of Europe, of Africa, of Asia, of Australia, and the far-off islands of the sea, and let us learn to place a little less confidence in the judgment of the day and a greater faith and reliance in the wisdom and the teachings of the ages.

"The past will teach us that no State has ever survived the assaults of time that was not built on the solid corner stone of truth and justice and equality of opportunity for all men. We shall learn, too, that there can be no truth without freedom of thought, no justice without freedom of discussion, no equality of opportunity without freedom of action. Every tyranny that has oppressed mankind since the beginning of history, whether it be the tyranny of autocracy, the tyranny of aristocracy, or the tyranny of democracy, flourished on intolerance of free thought, on suppression of free speech, and on denial of free action. In the State of the future we must set our faces like flint against every tendency to encourage these servants of tyranny. We must learn to expose every question affecting the welfare of the State to the searching light of free and full discussion and to abide the judgment of the people. But we must learn also that hackneyed oratory is not discussion, denunciation is not criticism, license is not freedom. We must learn that judgments rendered at the dictation of passion and prejudice are not likely to be 'true and righteous altogether.' We must learn that ideas are greater than persons, and principles more enduring than personalities. We must learn that as true liberty is liberty regulated by law, so nothing is more important to the people of a self-governing State than that stern and splendid regard for law which was the glory of Rome in her best days, and without which no people can be truly great or truly free. And, finally, we must learn that, while eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, eternal agitation is not eternal vigilance. Not till we have taken these lessons to heart shall we throw open the door of opportunity to every child in the State; not till then shall justice be enthroned in all the beauty of righteousness; and not till then shall 'Truth, shining patiently like a star, bid us advance, and we will not turn aside.'

"To educate the children of the State, to develop her resources, to revolutionize her industrial and agricultural system, to maintain her authority, to preserve her freedom—these are all great problems that have come to us out of the past; to solve them is the work of the future. We shall not solve them without the expenditure of much money and toil and sacrifice. But to these tasks the State is calling her best sons, and shall we shrink from her call? Consider the Confederate soldier. The one sentiment that overshadowed all others in his heart, was devotion to his State. For the State he lived, and in her defense he went forth to die. He knew no duty above his duty to the State, and he coveted no honor save the honor of the State. No labor was too hard, no burden too heavy, no sacrifice too great in her behalf. When she called him into her service, he invented no excuse, he uttered no murmur, he asked no reward. Inspired by his pride in her achievements, he imagined no greater joy than to share in the brightness of her glory; and warmed by her love, he sought no other fate than to go down with her in the darkness of defeat. If in the same spirit we too shall answer the call of the State of the future we may rest assured that we shall not go down with her in the darkness of defeat, but that we shall rejoice with her in the ever-increasing brightness of her eternal glory.

"Such then is that freer and nobler State that came triumphant out of the conflict of the sixties. Out of that conflict came also, as I have said, a more perfect and a more enduring Union—a Union of States, not of sections—of States sprung from a common source, created for a common purpose, and builded on a common foundation; a Union of States bound together by the history and traditions of a common past, united in the work of a common present, and destined to the glories of a common future.

"For this Union, memorial day, whether it honors the memory of those who followed Lee or the memory of those who followed Grant, has its final and deepest meaning. We shall not come to the observance of memorial day in the right spirit if our purpose be to rekindle the fires of bitter memories or of sectional animosities. But rather let us come in that spirit which declares:

> "The sons will preserve and will magnify the fame of their fathers, but they will not foster or fight over again their feuds, since the fathers themselves * * * long ago renounced rancor and dissolved differences. * * * We will filially honor the shades of our ancestors, but we will not cut ourselves among their tombs. * * * Our fathers fought out the questions which their fathers left unsettled. We recognize and rejoice in the settlement of those questions. But we are resolved that neither the charm of historical study, nor the passion nor the pathos of poetry, nor the pious exaltation which shrines excite and monuments inspire shall to-day hold back North and South from the new and noble obligations, and from the benign and brotherly competitions of this teeming time. Better a decade of love and peace than a cycle of the mutilations and of the memories of the Civil War. (St. Clair McKelway, in an address before the Conference for Education in the South, 1903.)

"In such a spirit the Confederate soldier, after four long years of conflict, submitted to the judgment of the God of battles, and in such a spirit the Nation will yet acknowledge the great debt which it owes to him. He fought the war in good faith; he laid down his arms in good faith; and he accepted the result in good faith. No apology for his course arose to his lips to belie his conscience; no vain regrets lingered in his heart to embitter his spirit. He turned from the battle field to his civic duties feeling 'malice toward none,' but 'charity for all'; ready to lend his hand to the task of binding up the Nation's wounds, and determined to contribute by voice and conduct toward establishing and cherishing a just and lasting peace between the torn and bleeding sections. Keeping always in view the harmony, peace, and happiness of the whole country, joining in the desire of all good men everywhere to hush forever the passions and prejudices of civil strife, disdaining to renounce his own faith or principles, but willing to trust his vindication to—

> "That flight of ages which are God's > Own voice to justify the dead,

"he called on all sections of his country to ignore sectional issues, and to address themselves to the task of restoring the Union in heart and soul.

"That task, ladies and gentlemen, has been accomplished: the Union has been restored. Fifty years after her secession the vanquished South sits in the councils of the Nation, an equal member with the triumphant North. By order of the President the name of Jefferson Davis, which was stricken in the heat of civil war from a great national work made possible by his genius, has been recarved on the corner stone of Cabin John Bridge and his image has been graven upon the silver service of the mighty battleship which bears the name of Mississippi, to be an inspiration of patriotism to her officers and her gallant crew. The beloved form of Robert E. Lee, clad in Confederate uniform, stands by that of Washington under the Dome of the National Capitol. And in the seat of John Marshall a Confederate soldier with learning, wisdom, and patriotism worthy of his great predecessor guides the deliberations of the Nation's highest court of justice. To-day the South holds in her hands the destinies of this Union, and all men know that they are in safe and honorable keeping.

"A half century is but a brief span in the life of a Nation. Yet the fiftieth anniversary of the morning on which the opening roar of those guns in Charleston Harbor shook this Union to its very foundations and threatened to tear it asunder found these States more closely bound together in the bonds of brotherhood than ever before, saw this Union more firmly established than ever in its whole history, and, in the glorious words of Daniel Webster, beheld 'the gorgeous ensign of the Republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased or polluted nor a single star obscured, bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as "What is all this worth?" nor those other words of delusion and folly, "Liberty first and union afterwards," but everywhere spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds as they float over the sea and over the land and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart, "Liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable!"' The accomplishment of this mighty task within the brief space of 50 years is one of the greatest triumphs of civilization in the history of mankind, and in this triumph no section of our country has borne a more honorable part than the old Confederate States, no man has contributed more nobly than the old Confederate soldier. His wisdom and prudence, his saneness and patience, his loyalty and patriotism through all the years since the war have won for him a warm place in the Nation's heart, and there it shall abide forever.

"And to-day as we gather to do honor to his memory shall we not resolve to follow his example and emulate his spirit? Let us forget the bitter memories, the passions, and the prejudices left in the wake of sectional strife and join heart and soul with all throughout our common country who pay tribute to those, whatever banner they may have followed, who unselfishly answered the call of duty as God gave them to see and understand it. On this memorial day, dear to our hearts for the memories it brings, the gallant spirits of Federal and Confederate, who so freely gave of their best blood in the service of their country, call to us to give as freely of ourselves to our great reunited Nation, and in the service of that Nation to think the highest that is in us to think, to do the best that is in us to do, and to be the noblest that is in us to be."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CULLOP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 5602. An act authorizing the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association to occupy and construct buildings for the use of the corporation on lots Nos. 3 and 4, block No. 114, in the city of Hot Springs, Ark.; and

H. R. 22999. An act providing for the construction and maintenance by the city of St. Louis, Mo., of an intake tower in the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 105. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of State, for and on behalf of Surgeon Eugene Masdin, late of the United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, to accept a decoration tendered him by the Italian Government and to present the same to the widow of the said Surgeon Masdin.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the naval service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We have begun the reading of the bill. It is now 5.30 o'clock——

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEFICIENCIES IN HOUSE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. FITZGERALD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 319) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report (No. 755), ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, House bill 18712, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 24, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting estimate of appropriation for the establishment of an immigration station in Chicago, Ill. (H. Doc. No. 764); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, calling attention to the depleted condition of fund for the prevention of the introduction and spread of contagious and infectious diseases and recommending an appropriation of $500,000 for this fund (H. Doc. No. 765); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FERGUSSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2875) to provide for the exchange of national forest timber in New Mexico for private lands lying within the exterior limits of the Zuni National Forest, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 754), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SIMMONS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, early in the present session of Congress I introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution fixing the term of office of the President of the United States at six years and providing that he shall be ineligible for a second term. The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) has been reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee with an amendment.

I have here extracts from the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 so far as those proceedings relate to this question. I think Senators will find them quite interesting and instructive. They show the sentiments of the different members of the Constitutional Convention with respect to this question that is now before the Senate.

I have also appended portions of a letter from Mr. Madison to Mr. Jefferson explaining the proceedings and the views and sentiments of such members on this important question. I therefore ask, Mr. President, that these extracts and this letter may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from California will be complied with.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXTRACTS FROM FARRAND'S RECORDS OF FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787.

(By Mr. WORKS.)

RANDOLPH'S PLAN.

Resolution.

May 29, 1787: 7. Resolved, That a National Executive be instituted, to be chosen by the National Legislature for the term of — years; to receive punctually at stated times a fixed compensation for the services rendered, in which no increase or diminution shall be made so as to affect the magistracy existing at the time of increase or diminution; and to be ineligible a second time.

June 1: It was moved and seconded to proceed to the consideration of the seventh resolution, submitted by Mr. Randolph, namely:

"Resolved, That a National Executive be instituted, to be chosen by the National Legislature for the term of — years; to receive punctually at stated times a fixed compensation for the services rendered, in which no increase or diminution shall be made so as to affect the magistracy existing at the time of such increase or diminution; and to be ineligible a second time; and that, besides a general authority to execute the national laws, it ought to enjoy the executive rights vested in Congress by the Confederation.

On motion by Mr. Wilson, seconded by Mr. C. Pinckney, to amend the first clause of the resolution by adding, after the word "instituted," the words "to consist of a single person," so as to read:

"Resolved, That a National Executive, to consist of a single person, be instituted."

It was moved and seconded to postpone the consideration of the amendment; and on the question to postpone it, passed in the affirmative.

It was then moved and seconded to agree to the first clause of the resolution, namely: "Resolved, That a National Executive be instituted," and on the question to agree to the said clause it passed in the affirmative.

It was then moved, by Mr. Madison, seconded by Mr. Wilson, after the word "instituted," to add the words: "with power to carry into execution the national laws, to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for, and to execute such powers, not legislative or judiciary in their nature, as may from time to time be delegated by the National Legislature," and on a division of the amendment the following clauses were agreed to, namely: "with power to carry into execution the national laws, to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for."

On the question to continue the last clause of the amendment, namely, "and to execute such other powers, not legislative or judiciary in their nature, as may from time to time be delegated by the National Legislature," it passed in the negative.

It was then moved and seconded to fill up the blank with the word "seven," so as to read: "for the term of seven years."

And on the question to fill up the blank with the word "seven," it passed in the affirmative—ayes, 5; noes, 4; divided, 1.

It was then moved and seconded to postpone the consideration of the following words, namely, "to be chosen by the National Legislature," and on the question to postpone it passed in the affirmative.

The seventh resolve, "That a National Executive be instituted," agreed to. "To continue in office for seven years," agreed to. "A general authority to execute the laws," agreed to. "To appoint all officers not otherwise provided for," agreed to.

The question of the unity or plurality of the Executive postponed, and the committee proceeded to examine the powers. These points being discussed, the committee took into consideration the duration of the office of the Executive.

Wilson—for three years and no exclusion or rotation.

Madison—seven years and an exclusion for ever after or during good behavior.

Mason—in favor of seven years and an exclusion afterwards. Thereby he is made independent of the legislature, who are proposed as his electors. If he is capable of reelection by the legislature the Executive will be complaisant, and reelect. The Executive will be subservient and court a reelection.

On the question to fill the blank for seven years: Massachusetts divided—Gorham and King, aye; Gerry and Strong, no. Connecticut, no. North Carolina, no. South Carolina, no. Georgia, no. New York, aye. New Jersey, aye. Pennsylvania, aye. Delaware, aye. Virginia, aye.

June 2: The question being then taken on the words contained in the resolution submitted by Mr. Randolph, namely, "to be ineligible a second time," it passed in the affirmative—ayes, 7; noes, 2; divided, 1.

June 13: State of the resolutions submitted to the consideration of the House by the Hon. Mr. Randolph, as altered, amended, and agreed to in a Committee of the Whole House.

9. Resolved, That a National Executive be instituted; to consist of a single person; to be chosen by the National Legislature, for the term of seven years, with power to carry into execution the national laws; to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for; to be ineligible a second time; and to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractices or neglect of duty; to receive a fixed stipend, by which he may be compensated for the devotion of his time to public service, to be paid out of the National Treasury.

June 13: Report of the Committee of Whole on Mr. Randolph's propositions:

1. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that a National Government ought to be established, consisting of a supreme legislative, executive, and judiciary.

9. Resolved, That a National Executive be instituted; to consist of a single person; to be chosen by the National Legislature for the term of seven years, with power to carry into execution the national laws; to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for; to be ineligible a second time; and to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractices or neglect of duty; to receive a fixed stipend by which he may be compensated for the devotion of his time to public service, to be paid out of the National Treasury.

July 17: "To be ineligible a second time"—Mr. Houston moved to strike out this clause.

Mr. Sherman seconded the motion.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris espoused the motion. The ineligibility proposed by the clause as it stood tended to destroy the great motive to good behavior, the hope of being rewarded by a reappointment. It was saying to him, "make hay while the sun shines."

On the question for striking out as moved by Mr. Houston (it passed in the affirmative): Massachusetts, aye; Connecticut, aye; New Jersey, aye; Pennsylvania, aye; Delaware, no; Maryland, aye; Virginia, no; North Carolina, no; South Carolina, no; Georgia, aye. Ayes, 6; noes, 4.

"For the term of seven years" resumed.

July 19: It was moved and seconded to agree to the following clause, namely, "for the term of seven years," which passed in the negative—ayes, 3; noes, 5; divided, 2.

On the question to agree to the following clause, namely, "for the term of six years," it passed in the affirmative—ayes, 9; noes, 1.

On the question to restore the words "to be ineligible a second time," it passed in the negative—ayes, 2; noes, 8.

On the question, Shall the Executive continue for seven years? It passed in the negative—Massachusetts, divided; Connecticut, aye; New Jersey, no; Pennsylvania, no; Delaware, no; Maryland, no; Virginia, no; North Carolina, divided; South Carolina, aye; Georgia, aye. Ayes, 3; noes, 5; divided, 2.

Mr. King was afraid we should shorten the term too much.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris was for a short term, in order to avoid impeachments, which would be otherwise necessary.

Mr. Butler was against a frequency of the elections.

Georgia and South Carolina were too distant to send electors often.

Mr. Ellsworth was for six years. If the elections be too frequent, the Executive will not be firm enough. There must be duties which will make him unpopular for the moment. There will be outs as well as ins. His administration therefore will be attacked and misrepresented.

Mr. Williamson was for six years. The expense will be considerable and ought not to be unnecessarily repeated. If the elections are too frequent, the best men will not undertake the service and those of an inferior character will be liable to be corrupted.

On question for six years: Massachusetts, aye; Connecticut, aye; New Jersey, aye; Pennsylvania, aye; Delaware, no; Maryland, aye; Virginia, aye; North Carolina, aye; South Carolina, aye; Georgia, aye—ayes, 9; noes, 1.

July 25: Mr. Pinkney moved that the election by the legislature be qualified with a proviso that no person be eligible for more than six years in any twelve years. He thought this would have all the advantage and at the same time avoid in some degree the inconveniency of an absolute ineligibility a second time.

Col. Mason approved the idea. It had the sanction of experience in the instance of Congresses and some of the executives of the States. It rendered the Executive as effectually independent as an ineligibility after his first election and opened the way at the same time for the advantage of his future services.

On Mr. Pinkney's motion that no person shall serve in the Executive office more than six years in twelve years, it passed in the negative: New Hampshire, aye; Massachusetts, aye; Connecticut, no; New Jersey, no; Pennsylvania, no; Delaware, no; Maryland, no; Virginia, no; North Carolina, aye; South Carolina, aye; Georgia, aye—ayes, 5; noes, 6.

July 26: It was moved and seconded to amend the third clause of the resolution respecting the National Executive so as to read as follows, namely: "For the term of seven years, to be ineligible a second time," which passed in the affirmative—ayes, 7; noes, 3.

Col. Mason: In every stage of the question relative to the Executive, the difficulty of the subject and the diversity of the opinions concerning it have appeared. * * * He conceived at the same time that a second election ought to be absolutely prohibited. Having for his primary object, for the pole star of his political conduct, the preservation of the rights of the people, he held it as an essential point, as the very palladium of civil liberty, that the great officers of State, and particularly the Executive should at fixed periods return to that mass from which they were at first taken, in order that they may feel and respect those rights and interests, which are again to be personally valuable to them. He concluded with moving that the constitution of the Executive as reported by the Committee of the Whole be reinstated, viz, "That the Executive be appointed for seven years and be ineligible a second time."

Question on Col. Mason's motion, as above, which passed in the affirmative: New Hampshire, aye; Massachusetts not on the floor; Connecticut, no; New Jersey, aye; Pennsylvania, no; Delaware, no; Maryland, aye; Virginia, aye; North Carolina, aye; South Carolina, aye; Georgia, aye—ayes 7, noes 3, absent 1.

On the question on the whole resolution as amended in the words following: "That a National Executive be instituted to consist of a single person to be chosen by the National Legislature for the term of seven years; to be ineligible a second time; with power to carry into execution the national laws; to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for; to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty; to receive a fixed compensation for the devotion of his time to the public service; to be paid out of the National Treasury," it passed in the affirmative: New Hampshire, aye; Massachusetts, not on floor; Connecticut, aye; New Jersey, aye; Pennsylvania, no; Delaware, no; Maryland, no; Virginia divided, Mr. B. [Blair] and Col. M. [Mason] aye, Gen. W. [Washington] and Mr. M. [Madison] no; Mr. Randolph happened to be out of the House; North Carolina, aye; South Carolina, aye; Georgia, aye—ayes 6, noes 3, divided 1, absent 1.

COMMITTEE OF DETAIL.

There was connected with the work of the convention what was known as a Committee of Detail. Documents preserved and set out in Farrand's Records of the Convention show the following relating to this question and mostly in the form of resolutions submitted to and acted upon by the convention, covering the time from July 14 to 26, 1787:

Resolved, That a National Executive be instituted to consist of a single person, to be chosen for the term of six years, with power to carry into execution the national laws; to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for; to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty; to receive a fixed compensation for the devotion of his time to public service; to be paid out of the Public Treasury.

Resolved, That a National Executive be instituted, to consist of a single person, to be chosen by the National Legislature for the term of seven years; to be ineligible for a second time; with power to carry into execution the national laws; to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for; to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty; to receive a fixed compensation for the devotion of his time to public service, to be paid out of the Public Treasury.

4. The Executive (Governor of the United People and States of America):

1. Shall consist of a single person;

2. Who shall (hold) be elected by the Legislature (by joint ballot (of which) each House have a negative on the other);

3. And shall hold his office for the term of (six) seven years;

4. And shall be ineligible thereafter.

The executive power of the United States shall be vested in a single person. His style shall be "The President of the United States of America," and his title shall be "His Excellency." He shall be elected by ballot by the Legislature. He shall hold his office during the term of seven years; but shall not be elected a second time.

September 4, 1787: Mr. Brearley, from the committee of eleven, made a further partial report, as follows: "The committee of eleven, to whom sundry resolutions, etc., were referred on the 31st of August, report that in their opinion the following additions and alterations should be made to the report before the convention, viz:

4. After the word "Excellency," in section 1, Article X, to be inserted "He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected in the following manner, viz:

COMMITTEE ON STYLE.

Proceedings of convention referred to the committee of style and arrangement.

We, the people of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, do ordain, declare, and establish the following Constitution for the government of ourselves and our posterity:

SECTION 1. The Executive power of the United States shall be vested in a single person. His style shall be "The President of the United States of America," and his title shall be "His Excellency." He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected in the following manner:

Report of the committee on style.

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

SECTION 1. The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected in the following manner.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES IN ITS COMPLETED FORM AS REPORTED BY COMMITTEE AND ADOPTED.

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE II.

SECTION 1. The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows.

Letter of James Madison to Thomas Jefferson explaining the course of the proceedings resulting in the present provision in the Constitution fixing the tenure of office and the reason given and views expressed by members of the convention relating to the subject, omitting observations contained in the letter relating to other portions of the Constitution. The letter in full appears in the appendix of Farrand's Records of the Federal Convention.

"NEW YORK, October 24, 1787.

"You will herewith receive the result of the convention, which continued its session till the 17th of September. I take the liberty of making some observations on the subject, which will help to make up a letter if they should answer no other purpose.

"It appeared to be the sincere and unanimous wish of the convention to cherish and preserve the union of the States. No proposition was made, no suggestion was thrown out, in favor of a partition of the Empire into two or more confederacies.

"It was generally agreed that the objects of the Union could not be secured by any system founded on the principle of a confederation of sovereign States. A voluntary observance of the Federal law by all the members could never be hoped for. A compulsive one could evidently never be reduced to practice, and if it could, involved equal calamities to the innocent and the guilty, the necessity of a military force both obnoxious and dangerous, and in general a scene resembling much more a civil war than the administration of a regular government.

Hence was embraced the alternative of a government which, instead of operating on the States, should operate without their intervention on the individuals composing them; and hence the change in the principle and proportion of representation.

This groundwork being laid, the great objects which presented themselves were: First. To unite a proper energy in the Executive and a proper stability in the legislative departments, with the essential characters of republican government. Second. To draw a line of demarcation which would give to the General Government every power requisite for general purposes and leave to the States every power which might be most beneficially administered by them. Third. To provide for the different interests of different parts of the Union. Fourth. To adjust the clashing pretensions of the large and small States. Each of these objects was pregnant with difficulties. The whole of them together formed a task more difficult than can be well conceived by those who were not concerned in the execution of it. Adding to these considerations the natural diversity of human opinions on all new and complicated subjects, it is impossible to consider the degree of concord which ultimately prevailed as less than a miracle.

The first of these objects as respects the Executive was peculiarly embarrassing. On the question whether it should consist of a single person or a plurality of coordinate members, on the mode of appointment, on the duration in office, on the degree of power, on the reeligibility, tedious and reiterated discussions took place. The plurality of coordinate members had finally but few advocates. Gov. Randolph was at the head of them. The modes of appointment proposed were various, as by the people at large, by electors chosen by the people, by the executives of the States, by the Congress, some preferring a joint ballot of the two Houses, some a separate concurrent ballot, allowing to each a negative on the other House—some a nomination of several candidates by one House, out of whom a choice should be made by the other. Several other modifications were started. The expedient at length adopted seemed to give pretty general satisfaction to the Members. As to the duration in office, a few would have preferred a tenure during good behavior, a considerable number would have done so in case an easy and effectual removal by impeachment could be settled. It was much agitated whether a long term—seven years, for example, with a subsequent and perpetual ineligibility—or a short term, with a capacity to be reelected, should be fixed. In favor of the first opinion were urged the danger of a gradual degeneracy of reelections from time to time, into first a life and then a hereditary tenure, and the favorable effect of an incapacity to be reappointed on the independent exercise of the Executive authority. On the other side it was contended that the prospect of necessary degradation would discourage the most dignified characters from aspiring to the office, would take away the principal motive to the faithful discharge of its duties—the hope of being rewarded with a reappointment would stimulate ambition to violent efforts for holding over the constitutional term—and instead of producing an independent administration and a firmer defense of the constitutional rights of the department would render the officer more indifferent to the importance of a place which he would soon be obliged to quit forever, and more ready to yield to the encroachments of the legislature of which he might again be a member. The questions concerning the degree of power turned chiefly on the appointment to offices and the control of the legislature. An absolute appointment to all offices—to some offices, to no offices—formed the scale of opinions on the first point. On the second some contended for an absolute negative as the only possible means of reducing to practice the theory of a free government which forbids a mixture of the legislative and executive powers. Others would be content with a revisionary power, to be overruled by three-fourths of both Houses. It was warmly urged that the judiciary department should be associated in the revision. The idea of some was that a separate revision should be given to the two departments—that if either objected, two-thirds; if both, three-fourths, should be necessary to overrule.

PHASES IN THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, some two or three days ago I made some remarks in the Senate with reference to certain remarkable performances going on in the country of a political nature, particularly as concerns the speeches and work being done by Republican candidates for the Presidency.

I then called attention to the fact that the President had charged that an enormous sum had been raised and was being expended to promote the nomination of ex-President Roosevelt, and that Senator LA FOLLETTE, who is also a pronounced and aggressive candidate for the Republican nomination, had charged substantially the same thing, but a little more specifically, saying that over a million dollars had been produced by certain multimillionaire trust magnates to advance the same personal cause.

On yesterday my attention was called to a very short editorial in the Virginian-Pilot and the Norfolk Landmark—that is the name of the paper—printed on yesterday. I remembered while reading this editorial that Mr. Roosevelt some time ago—the exact time is not now in my mind—had been invited to address a Republican club at Chicago, an important party organization, and that he declined after reaching Chicago to attend the function unless Senator LORIMER was excluded, although LORIMER was a member of the club and one of the hosts of the occasion.

This editorial is so pertinent that I desire to read it that it may become a part of the current literature of this remarkable day and period. It is as follows:

[From the Virginian-Pilot and the Norfolk Landmark, Thursday, May 23, 1912.]

The report of a majority of the committee of Senators in the Lorimer case may not be such as the facts in the case would justify or as the ends of strict justice demanded, but it would have been supremely illogical to condemn LORIMER for spending a hundred thousand dollars of trust contributions to win a seat in the Senate while a large percentage of the Republican voters of the country were enthusiastically backing for the Presidency a man whose canvass is being financed to the tune of millions by corporations now under indictment in the Federal courts for violations of the law. Suppose LORIMER did win his Senatorship through aid of money contributed by the Lumber Trust. Why should he be branded as corrupt by Roosevelt, who is using in larger measure the funds of the Steel, Harvester, and affiliated trusts to purchase delegates favorable to his nomination for a third term in the White House? LORIMER prostituted the politics of a State; Roosevelt is debauching the electorate of an entire Nation. LORIMER'S offense is as a molehill compared to the mountainous proportions of Roosevelt's crime.

I think that is excellently well stated and in a short space, and I have read it that it might go into the RECORD for the use of the future historian.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20586) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) to declare and make certain the authority of the Attorney General to begin and maintain, and of any court of competent jurisdiction to entertain and decide, a suit or suits for the purpose of having judicially declared a forfeiture of the rights granted by the act entitled "An act granting to the Washington Improvement & Development Co. a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington," approved June 4, 1898, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Schuylkill Haven, Pa., praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for a continuance of the appropriation for the extension of American trade with foreign countries, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

JOHN W. SAVILLE.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 171) placing John W. Saville, passed assistant engineer,

United States Navy, on the retired list with an advanced rank, and I submit a report (No. 798) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is there a report with the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. There is a report.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask that it be printed, and that the bill go over. I want to examine the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Pardon me one moment. I will say to the Senator that this bill has passed the Senate once unanimously.

Mr. BRISTOW. That may be true. I should like to see the report on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will go to the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 6939) for the relief of Fred R. Payne; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 6940) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct bridges across the San Carlos and Gila Rivers, on the White Mountain or San Carlos Indian Reservation, in the State of Arizona, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 6941) granting a pension to Adelaide W. Wheeler (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CATRON:

A bill (S. 6942) to establish the Pecos National Game Refuge in the State of New Mexico, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

A bill (S. 6943) providing an appropriation for the sinking of a public well at Montoya, Guadalupe County, N. Mex.; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 6944) to provide and equip an additional fire-protection station in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 6945) granting a pension to Charles Meyers (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 6946) authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Flathead Indian Reservation to the town of Ronan, State of Montana, for the purposes of a public park and public-school site; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

On motion of Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, it was Ordered, That the President having returned to the Senate, in compliance with Senate concurrent resolution 21, the bill (H. R. 14083) to create a new division of the southern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Corpus Christi, Tex., and for a clerk of said court, and for other purposes, and the Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate having canceled his signature to said bill, the Secretary of the Senate is directed to return said bill to the House of Representatives for the cancellation of the Speaker's signature.

EIGHT-HOUR LABOR LAW.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 9061) limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory, or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho how long he thinks it will take to dispose of this bill?

Mr. BORAH. My opinion is, from the information which I have, that it will not take over 30 or 40 minutes at the outside.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose it should take longer than that, will the Senator insist upon going on with it during the whole of the morning hour?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I should want to keep it before the Senate until the unfinished business should come up, unless we dispose of it before that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho to proceed to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. BORAH. In regard to this amendment, I am not going to object to it. The amendment covers a proposition or a principle which it might be well to consider in conference. I realize that there may be conditions and emergencies, that unexpected things may happen in manufacturing establishments which ought to be taken care of, and if it can be worked out in conference by proper language so as to protect against the abuse of it, I shall be glad to consider it in that light. Therefore I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is precisely what I suggested to the Senator when the matter was up before. I am very much gratified that the Senator from Idaho is willing to have the matter go to conference. I presume the Senator has given it careful consideration. I think it will be agreed that this is a proper amendment, but whatever the result of it may be, I will be satisfied.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 4, line 4, after the word "any," insert the words "extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture or to any," so that it will read:

No penalties shall be imposed for any violation of such provision in such contract to any extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture or to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, by danger to life or to property, or by other extraordinary event or condition on account of which the President shall subsequently declare the violation to have been justifiable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will offer the amendment I send to the desk, which, I think, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will agree may well go to conference. Possibly the time I have stated in the amendment is longer than is necessary, but the conferees can arrange that very readily. It is a matter of importance, as I view it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 16, it is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That this act shall become effective and be in force on and after January 1, 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is an amendment pending offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I want to say in regard to that amendment that it has for its object and purpose, as I understand it, simply making the language more specific and certain, the Senator from Ohio being of the opinion that the language as now found in the bill is somewhat involved, or, rather, that the sentences as they are connected are not clear. If that be the purpose of the amendment, I am perfectly willing that it shall go to conference.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has correctly stated my position in reference to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is not pending. Does the Senator from Ohio now offer the amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. It was offered the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was printed with notice that it would be offered, the Chair thinks. The Senator from Ohio, as the Chair understands, now offers the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. I ask that the Secretary read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 14, after the word "intelligence," it is proposed to insert "or for the purchase of supplies by the Government, whether manufactured to conform to particular specifications or not," and to strike out the same words, beginning with the word "or," in line 17, and ending with the words "or not," in line 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know if this is another one of the amendments that are to go in with the understanding that they will probably go out in conference?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President. I have accepted both these amendments in perfect good faith. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is designed to make more specific, certain, and clear the language of the bill, and certainly I shall consider that kind of an amendment in perfect good faith. If it has that purpose and that effect, it will not likely go out in conference, but it will likely stay in. It will, in other words, have the earnest consideration of the conference committee.

So far as the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is concerned, we have all realized in drawing this bill that there might be conditions in manufacturing establishments, and so forth, where such an emergency might arise as that the President should exempt them from its operations in that particular respect. The difficulty we have had and the difficulty which undoubtedly we shall have is in putting in the principle and at the same time guarding it against abuse; that is, guarding against its being used under conditions which are not overwhelming or unforeseen or extraordinary. Both of the amendments have been accepted with the purpose on the part of the Senator having charge of the bill to consider them in perfect good faith. If they can be worked out, then they will certainly have a chance to remain.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is an introduction of the principle of the recall here—the first time that I have known it to be attempted to be done in a responsible way. The President is authorized to recall a law—if this is anything, it is a law—and we are proposing that the President may, at his option, recall it. We have never had the question before this body so that it received recognition as a principle of legislation. I remember a few years ago when the Executive did suspend the operation of the laws of the United States. Of course there was no authority for doing it. When a law is enacted only the power making it can change it; but this in another movement along that line on a little different angle; but it is a mighty dangerous proposition to give the President the power to suspend the operation of a law when, in his judgment, it is not applicable or would work a hardship. It is for us to consider whether laws will work hardship or are inapplicable under certain conditions. If we would say directly here that in the event of the happening of these things this law should not be operative, then we would have placed a limitation upon the scope of the law. We have the power to do that; but when we say that somebody else may pass upon that question we violate the principle under which laws should be made in this body. I do not like to see it. There seems to be some evidence of a heavily felted steam roller in regard to this measure, and I suppose all I can do is to enter a protest against it.

I am not opposed in principle to some things contained in this bill, but I am opposed to the method that is proposed to accomplish them. I will at the proper time, perhaps within a few minutes, state my reasons more specifically; but I call attention to the amendment that went through with the understanding. There are two sorts of recall accompanying that amendment. The first is that my distinguished colleague from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] may in conference recall the action of this body. That is candidly stated. He has a free option. Then the next is that the President may recall it.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to be in perfectly safe hands in both instances.

Mr. HEYBURN. If such a power was to be placed in the hands of anyone, I would have no objection at all to it being placed there; I have great confidence in the ability and, of course, in the integrity of both sources of power; but it is rather unusual. We are drifting a long way from the landmarks here; but, whether we will get back or not, I say we, the men of this generation—there will be generations of people following us who will know what liberty under the law means and be able to distinguish it from liberty under license.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I would not care to vote for any law which gave the President of the United States the power to suspend the law. I do not understand that there is any provision in this bill which proposes to give the President any such power.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is, in express terms.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President. I will first say that the bill provides that under certain contingencies the proposed law shall not apply; and it simply devolves upon the President the authority to determine whether or not those contingencies exist.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is to say, if the Senator will pardon me, the President passes on the facts; the President is a jury. That is one of the functions I had overlooked.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is a power which we confer upon the President by every criminal statute we pass. We pass a law, and the President determines whether or not the given facts fall within the operation of the law or fall without the operation of the law. That is an executive power. We simply propose to provide here that, on certain emergencies arising, the law shall not apply; and, as an executive power, and purely as an executive power, we authorize the President to determine whether or not those facts and whether or not those contingencies exist, upon the existence of which the law itself requires it shall not operate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am a little bit confused to understand the Senator's statement that in every case in regard to the enforcement of a criminal law we give the President this power. I know it is exercised sometimes; at least, I hear it stated with loud acclaim that it is exercised, but I have not recognized that claim as being well founded. I may, however, misunderstand the Senator's reference.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, we pass a criminal statute providing that any person who does certain things shall be guilty of a criminal offense and subject to punishment. Somebody must determine whether the things which the individual in a given case has been done fall within or fall without the operation of that statute.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was under the impression that the courts did that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; primarily, before an action can be maintained, an executive officer must determine it. The President, acting through the Attorney General or through the district attorney, determines that the law has been violated, and an action is brought. In the last analysis, of course, the courts determine.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not agree to that. A United States district attorney has the right, the power, and the duty to enforce a law through the trial and punishment of the offender, without the knowledge or consent of either the United States Attorney General or the President, and does do it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, who determines?

Mr. HEYBURN. The district attorney obeys the law. In the first place, the grand jury is called and determines whether or not the man is guilty, having the law stated to them by the district attorney. Of course, I know now it is common to send out a Federal order, first through the newspapers and then afterwards through some other source, that you are going to prosecute so-and-so for a violation of the antitrust law, for instance; but I am talking about the real law, not the fictitious law; I am talking about it as it is practiced in times of conservative wisdom and judgment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Who determines whether or not a case shall be laid before the grand jury?

Mr. HEYBURN. The United States district attorney; and he obtains the information that actuates him to do it or not to do it, first, from an investigation of the facts of his own accord, and he requires nobody's license or consent to do it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, the district attorney determines whether it is a case that ought to be laid before the grand jury.

Mr. HEYBURN. He determines it, just as a constable, hearing that a crime has been committed, determines whether or not he ought to arrest a party.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely. He determines it as an executive function.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, the executive function must not necessarily start in every case at the fountainhead, the President of the United States. By general authority of law the district attorney is invested with the duty and the power to prosecute where his attention is called to a violation of the law even by a passing citizen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He may proceed to do it without referring the matter to the President in each case, but the source of his authority is the President, because the Constitution provides that in the President is vested the executive power; and among the things which are embraced within the executive power is the power to see that the laws are enforced.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator would not contend that a United States judge was bound to any extent under any circumstances in the prosecution or trial of a case by any order that might be issued by the President or by the Attorney General? The judges of the United States courts are appointed for life; they are appointed so that they will not be the plaything of politics in recurring changes in the Government, in order that they may stand out as impartial judges, holding truly balanced the scales of justice. That is the United States court, and the President of the United States is not bigger than the United States court when it comes to a question of determining whether or not a person charged with an offense shall be tried.

I have had petition after petition, as I presume other Senators have had, asking for interference to prevent the prosecution of this man or that man, or to affect it in some way. The people are under the impression, from oft-repeated abuses of the power and the law, that there is a Federal power here in Washington that can say to a United States court, "You dismiss that indictment," or "You conduct that trial thus and so," or "You allow this man to escape." That is modern—extremely so. A proposition of that kind a few years ago would have been brushed aside as the most foolish of procedure.

Now, I say in this case you are recognizing that principle which is claimed to exist, but does not exist, and, while I do not intend at this time to go into it, I say that much against commencing here a system of initiative and referendum. We initiate a measure and it is referred to a conference committee. If the conference committee does not agree with us, it strikes it out, and when we initiate it we do it with the understanding that it will probably be stricken out. In this case the amendment is introduced, accompanied by a statement that the Senator—not the Senate, but the Senator—will deal with it in the conference committee. When we enact a law it should be on the assumption that it is a solemn procedure in the performance of our duty; that the presumption is against changing it, and that neither a conference committee nor a Senator nor any other subdivision of power is at liberty to treat it as a mere tentative proposition for the enactment of a law. That is the reason that I object to those expressions, and I object to the adoption of amendments based upon that principle. When the Senator has his amendments disposed of I am going to say a few words as to the principle of this bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator who has charge of the bill to line 8, on page 4.

Mr. BORAH. I understand there is an amendment still pending. May we dispose of that first? I understand the Senator from Indiana is going to another matter. I inquire of the Chair if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has not been disposed of. It will be again stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to transfer the words beginning in lines 17, 18, and 19, page 3, section 2, "or for the purchase of supplies by the Government, whether manufactured to conform to particular specifications or not," from their present location in the bill to follow the word "intelligence," in line 14, of page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, in line 8, page 4 of the bill, I move to substitute the word "excusable," for the word "justifiable."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the word "justifiable" and insert the word "excusable."

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I do not contend that there is much significance in this particular amendment, but I do not like to incorporate into a statute a provision for a "justifiable" violation of the law. It is bad enough to have excusable violations of the law, and I believe that the word "excusable" will be less offensive than the word "justifiable."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have a more fundamental objection to it than that. I recognize the fact that there ought to be possibly provided some method by which in extraordinary cases parties could be relieved from the penalty of a violation of the law. I do not recognize that it is a proper thing to do to put that discretion in the power of the Executive; in other words, I think it is a fundamental error in legislation to put it in the power of any one man to nullify a law, and that is what this provision does.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. ROOT. I merely wish to express my concurrence in the view of the Senator from Georgia. I do not think it should be treated as an Executive function.

Mr. BACON. I think not also. I repeat that there may be—and I can conceive that there will be—some circumstances under which parties should be excused, but to put it in the power of one man absolutely to nullify a law would only be justified in case we had a man who was a perfect man, and such an individual does not come along every day—in fact, never.

I would prefer, Mr. President, if possible, that that should be arranged in some other way. I do not know—I am not on the committee which considered this measure and have not given the matter careful investigation and thought—I do not know whether any other way is practicable, but if so, the other way ought to be devised.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Georgia, in my opinion, are in error as to what is being done in this instance; but, at the same time, the Senator in charge of the bill would be glad to have the suggestion of either one of them as to how to accomplish what we desire to accomplish and accomplish it in a proper way.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that unless it can be accomplished in a proper way I would rather it would not be accomplished at all.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BACON. Before I would put it in the power of the President of the United States or give him the authority to say that a law should not be enforced, if it is necessary that the law should be passed, then I would rather pass it in such shape that the party who may be affected will submit to the hardship rather than to resort to the other alternative. What other machinery can be provided, of course, I have not considered, my mind not having been directed to this until the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana suggested the grave consequences of any such provision of law.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator from Georgia concurs in the general opinion that if this language is to remain the word "excusable" should be used.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. I think that will fully cure the objection to that provision. That objection is fundamental, but if this language is kept in the bill I think that word had better be used.

Mr. BACON. It would be better to leave out the words in the bill and leave it to the courts to say whether it was justifiable. That is sufficient, I have no doubt, in a case of that kind. With that provision contained in the first four lines of that clause it would be a rare case where, in the event an emergency did exist, that they would ever be called upon to pay a penalty, and if they were called upon, the defense would be like in every other case.

We have numerous statutes where there are penalties imposed or certain requirements and where there are certain conditions under which the party is excused or where he is not liable. It seems to me if the sentence read:

> No penalties shall be imposed for any violation of such provision in such contract due to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, by danger to life or to property, or by any other extraordinary event or condition.

Mr. O'GORMAN and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from New York first addressed the Chair. I will yield to him first and afterwards to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I heartily join in the request of the Senator from Georgia, but I offered this additional suggestion to carry out his proposal: Insert the word "imminent," before the word "danger," in line 5; and to strike out the last word in line 6, all of line 7, and all of line 8, down to and including the word "justifiable."

Mr. BACON. The Senator's suggestion, I think, is an admirable one, and covers the ground more fully than the amendment suggested by me.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have an amendment to the one suggested by the Senator from New York, which I should like to submit for his consideration. After the word "condition," in line 6, in lieu of the words there, to insert "beyond the power of the contractors to control."

Mr. BACON. I do not think that would be——

Mr. BORAH. I am not very friendly to those suggestions, because I think them wholly unnecessary, but I certainly would not want this additional amendment of the Senator from Wyoming. We had a great deal of discussion with reference to the things they could control and with reference to the things they could not control, and I should be utterly opposed to providing by this bill to leave it with the contractor to determine the situation.

Mr. BACON. I am in favor of the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York—the insertion of the word "imminent" before the word "danger," and to strike out what he suggests. I hope the Senator will offer the amendment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I offer the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Before that is put to a vote, as I recall, this particular sentence was amended by a proposal by the Senator from New Hampshire. Certain words were inserted. I do not have them in mind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the provision as it has been amended.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "emergency," in line 4, a committee amendment was agreed to, inserting the words "extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture or of any," so that it reads:

No penalties shall be imposed for any violation of such provision in such contract due to any extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture or of any emergency cause by fire, famine, or flood.

Mr. BACON. That does not change the sentence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has offered an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 6, 7, and 8 strike out the words "on account of which the President shall subsequently declare the violation to have been excusable," and before the word "danger," in line 5, to insert "imminent."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Minnesota addressed the Chair before I did, and I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think this provision open to the constitutional objections urged. If Senators will note the language here it simply amounts to this, that it makes the President an umpire to determine whether the conditions exist.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is the objection.

Mr. NELSON. In a contract between the Government and contractors the parties can incorporate such conditions in the contract. We have instances of that kind in respect to the Reclamation Service. The chief engineer of the Reclamation Service is the umpire to determine in all cases of controversy whether the terms of the contract have been complied with and whether the classification of the work should be of one kind or another.

Now, here we simply leave the President—we might designate somebody else—as an umpire to determine whether the conditions exist which the contract provides for. Somebody must determine it. If the two parties can not agree—if the Government on the one side and the contractor on the other side can not agree—an umpire must settle it, and it must go into the courts. The Government and the contractor have a right to agree in their contract and to say that they will leave it to the President of the United States to determine whether these conditions exist. Now, that is all there is in this.

Mr. BACON. Nobody that I have heard has suggested anything about the constitutionality of the provision, although that might be raised. The very thing the Senator has suggested is the objectionable thing, and that is, having anybody clothed with the power to say whether a law shall be enforced or shall not be enforced. We lay down the rule and the exception, and it is for the court to determine.

Mr. BORAH. I am not going to discuss the policy just now, but as to our right to pass a law of this kind, I have no doubt whatever. This is a contractual relation between the Government and the parties who work for the Government. They enter into a contract, and the contract provides that under certain conditions certain penalties shall be imposed. That is a contractual relation. Who is authorized to forgive that violation of the contract between the Government and the other party who has entered into the contract? I have not yet been informed of any constitutional inhibition against our power to say that we shall elect an umpire to determine whether or not a certain penalty imposed under the contract shall be forgiven.

Mr. RAYNER. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that that is covered by the case of Field v. Clark, where the President exercised similar power. There are a number of such cases. I do not think there is any legal or constitutional objection. Whether or not it is good policy is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not heard any objection to the clause immediately preceding the one under discussion, and yet it is precisely the same in effect. The preceding clause says "The President, by Executive order, may waive the provisions of this act and stipulations in this act"——

Mr. BACON. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa, if he will pardon me——

Mr. CUMMINS. "As to any specific contract or contracts during time of war or a time when war is imminent."

Mr. BACON. While I have not indicated that objection, I have the same objection to that provision, though it is only of less degree.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not heard any objection to that part of the bill, and it seemed to me it involved precisely the same principle that is involved in the clause under consideration.

There are certain conditions under which it is intended to allow the United States, acting through some authorized officer, to relieve the contractor of the penalties provided in the contract.

Now, the President can do that in regard to contracts during time of war or when war is imminent. The President can also, acting for the United States, surrender the penalties which have accrued in behalf of the United States in cases of famine, fire, danger to life, and so forth.

I can not understand why it is not entirely safe, aside from the legal questions which I have not really heard mooted, to allow the President of the United States to remit the penalties which by the strict terms of the contract may have been incurred in the cases which are enumerated in the bill. If we have confidence in our Chief Executive to the extent of allowing him, on behalf of the Government, to remit penalties, it seems to me we ought to have that confidence in this instance.

We now give subordinate officials power to remit penalties and make compromises under certain circumstances, in regard to the internal-revenue law and possibly some other statutes. Our laws are full of instances in which we have clothed some officer of the Government with power to remit penalties and even to remit taxes themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. Why should we hesitate about giving to the President of the United States power to remit these penalties in those cases in which it would seem that by reason of fire or flood or famine or danger it would be unjust, inequitable, and unfair to exact them?

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has spoken on the assumption that the President has the right to pass upon the question whether war is imminent. He has not. He not only has not the right, but there could be no greater impropriety than for the President to perform an official act which would involve action on his part that war was imminent. The declaration of war is within the power of Congress. The President has nothing to do with it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggested nothing like that. I said the previous clause gave to the President the power to waive these stipulations in a contract in cases of war or in cases of the imminence of war. I did not say that the President had any power to declare war or to declare that war was imminent.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator misunderstood me. Perhaps he did not listen carefully. I made no such statement, and I did not invoke that principle. I simply said how could the President pass on the case on the ground that war was imminent or on account of a declaration of that kind which he had no right to make.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say, responding to the Senator, that we may be confronted by an invasion. Suppose one of the contending parties in Mexico, armed, should come over the borders, as they did originally in the instance in which Texas fought for independence. We may find ourselves in the midst of a war without Congress taking any action, and in such a case who would have the power to say war is imminent? Must the President wait in that case until Congress has acted?

Mr. RAYNER. The President has acted. The Senator is perfectly right.

Mr. CUMMINS. This does not even contemplate that the President of the United States shall issue a proclamation saying that war is imminent. If the President believes that war is imminent and that the situation requires that contracts shall not contain the stipulation that men shall work only 8 hours a day, then he can eliminate those stipulations from the contract. I have no doubt whatever about the power of the President to do that thing and no doubt about the wisdom of giving the President the power to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just a word. The Senator very correctly stated that the same power is delegated to other officials. I know that in two instances of recent date the collector of internal revenue in my own State——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Senators on this side would be glad to hear what the Senator is saying.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was remarking that the Senator very correctly stated that in other instances there is a delegation of power so far as concerns the remission of penalties.

In my own State, in two recent cases, the collector of internal revenue remitted penalties under circumstances that seemed to justify their remission, he acting under the authority of his superiors. So it seems to me, if subordinates can do that and do it legally, we might well trust the President of the United States in great emergencies to exercise this power. That is the way it strikes me as a layman, and I trust the bill may not be amended in that particular.

The power conferred upon the President in this case is the kind of power given not only to the President, but to nearly all the chief officers of the United States, and I can not see constitutional objection to this bill as it is, nor can I see the least objection from the standpoint of policy.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the recognition of the Chair, but I will waive that; but that is not a good reason——

Mr. RAYNER. I have not given any reason. The Senator says I do not give a good reason.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator said to me that the bill came from his committee, and he claimed some special privilege. The committee has no longer anything to do with this matter; it is the Senate.

Mr. RAYNER. I claim no special privilege. If the Senator from Idaho wants the floor he can take it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The Senator from Maryland will proceed.

Mr. RAYNER. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. President, I have only a few words to say. I think that the arguments of the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Iowa are unanswerable on this subject. As a matter of law I do not think there can be any doubt about it at all. I think Field v. Clark and Stranahan's case, where the Secretary of the Treasury exercised an almost similar power, settled the law on the subject.

I think it is constitutional, and I think it is legal to give the President this power. I do not think any Senator on the floor will deny the right of Congress to give the President this power.

Now, that is upon the question of the law. I do not think I am mistaken upon that. Upon the question of policy I think it is one of the best provisions in the bill. It is for the purpose of avoiding litigation that this provision is put in the bill. The penalties in the bill are severe, and if an extraordinary occasion should occur and the controversy should be delayed until the courts decide it, in the meantime the penalties go on, and if the decision of the court is against the party the penalties accrue. Why not in the meantime invest some one with the solemn duty of an arbitrator to decide whether such an extraordinary condition has arisen as would justify or excuse the violation of the law, and what better person could we designate in the bill than the President of the United States? I care not who he is or what party he belongs to, I think this is a duty that we may safely confide in any President of the United States:

> No penalties shall be imposed for any violation of such provision in such contract due to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, by danger to life or to property, or by other extraordinary event or condition on account of which the President shall subsequently declare the violation to have been justifiable.

Suppose such an event or condition happens and the parties violating it say it is an extraordinary event or condition, and the Government officers say it is not an extraordinary event or condition. Then the matter goes to court, and there it stays for years, until appellate tribunals decide as to the question of fact whether or not an extraordinary event or condition had arisen that justified or excused the violation of the law.

Why not in the meantime let some one who is supposed to be impartial in an important matter of this sort decide whether or not the extraordinary event has happened so as to avoid a controversy in the courts? As I said, what man could be selected better than the President of the United States? I would just as leave trust him as trust the courts in a case of this sort, no matter who the President may be.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that argument would apply to every controversy between the Government and individuals. It is that the President should be transferred from the executive and administrative departments and duties to the judiciary. That is what it amounts to. You substitute or propose to substitute—I do not know whether you will or not, but you propose to substitute the President as a court. The Senator confesses that the duties to be performed by the President would be those ordinarily performed by the court. It is to be done because the court is too cumbersome a method; that is all.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. RAYNER. I always listen to the Senator with great interest, and we get a great deal of information, generally, from what he says. But what he says now does not follow at all. It is an illogical suggestion. I do not suggest that the President of the United States be substituted in place of the courts. I said that in this bill, which affects the entire interests of the country, it being a public measure, the President should simply be allowed to determine when an extraordinary event takes place that excuses a violation of the law. I go no further than that.

Mr. HEYBURN. That involves the President of the United States passing upon the facts and determining as a court does whether or not the fact being established brings them within the purview of the law. You can not get away from that. They circle round and round it, but they light in the same old dovecote.

This is so plain a violation of the foundation principles of our Government that it stirs one's resentment that Congress should undertake to say that the right given to an individual by contract—a contract made in pursuance of law under the protection and the authority of law—should be adjudged not in the courts but by the President. Why, we are getting back to the old days when men will come, as we see pictures of them with their cloaks flying in the air, to the door of the chancellor and asking for protection under the law. We have passed that. We have a government. We have in full and complete operation the departments of the Government, each equipped and authorized to do its duty, its peculiar duty, not the duty of some other branch of the Government, but to perform the duty belonging to that branch of the Government.

How far are we going to drift? We have seen a good many Executive orders in the last two years. We have seen more Executive orders in violation of the law since I have been a Member of this body than were ever attempted even in the hundred years or more that preceded it; and they are growing, and the threat of them is to-day ringing in the air in the great political campaign, the threat of more usurpation by executive and administrative officers of the functions of our department of the Government, a greater department than the executive. The executive department of the Government ranks last. It is named last in the Constitution. It has no functions to perform in the absence of the others, unless we are to have a monarchy. There is no need of an executive department of the Government until after the great legislative department, which is the people themselves, have acted and spoken. This idea that because, for instance, the executive department of the Government hands out the loaves and fishes, it should be the object of worship, as the dog worships the cook because the cook is closer to the dog's comfort than any other person, just so the master, the owner of the estate, has little respect in the eye of the dog. So we find people—and I do not intend my comparison to be invidious, but enlightening only—we find people that because an administrative branch of the Government may or may not confer what seems to be a favor, social or personal, upon them, that that department of the Government should take precedence in the estimate to be made between the functions of this Government as applied to it.

The people sit in Congress; they do not sit in the executive halls and departments. Their agents sit here, selected by the people to perform limited duties, the duties that the people command them. The people sit here limited only by their great charter, which is the contract among themselves as to what they will do and what they will not do. The judicial department sits to determine whether or not either branch transgresses the limits of power. But they both stand before the executive in point of government.

Now, we are too much the victims, we are too much the dupes of the blare of the trumpet and the glitter of the uniform. We find ourselves trying to square ourselves with the wishes, trying to answer the beck and call of those who may withhold or confer favors. Favors are not the current coin in our Government. Favors belong to kings and monarchies. They were not contemplated by the founders of this Government. It is a government of law as distinguished from a government of favor. There is danger, and it never was greater than in this hour, of favor becoming the criterion of action.

Mr. President, there is no more propriety in giving the President of the United States the right to suspend the laws we make than there would be to give him the right to make the laws without our concurrence. Will the hour never come when the responsibilities that rest upon us will concentrate themselves so as to produce a strict observance of the letter and the spirit of the Constitution? Was there at any time in the minds of those who made it a concession in the interest of government by proclamation? They never dreamed it. They had been living under that, and the experience and life under it had made them rise up and throw it off and they were freed from it. Are we to go back to it? Are we to be like some plants that for want of attention and cultivation will revert to the former condition of wildness? If we do, God save the people of our country, because they have no hope in this hour except in and through their representatives.

Now, let us see. This may seem like a trifling thing. It is a few words in the bill, but it says:

The President, by Executive order, may waive the provisions and stipulations in this act as to any specific contract or contracts during time of war or a time when war is imminent.

That is a complete sentence in itself. We enact a law and send it to him, and he signs it with the reserved power in himself to waive it. What does it mean to waive a law? It means to suspend its operation, to render it inoperative, whether it be for a day—there is no limitation in this bill—or whether it be for a year. The provision is that he may waive it. It matters not as to the enumeration of the occasions upon which he may waive it. The question in my mind is, Should we or can we or dare we give him the power to waive it for a minute in any case?

Who is to determine the occasions upon which this extraordinary power may be exercised? It says he may waive the "stipulations in this act as to any specific contract or contracts during time of war or a time when war is imminent." In the judgment of a certain class of our people war is imminent every hour, and has been since the hour of my birth or that of any man in this body. You can go out on the street corners or pick up one of the journals or magazines and read a declaration of war that is in the judgment of those making it absolutely certain. It is to be a war of races, or a war of classes, or a war with Japan, or a war with Mexico, or with Germany, or what not. To those men, with the President, they would be justified in suspending the operation of this law every day and any day. Should it be possible to get a President who was of this caliber or of the caliber of those who are making these dire suggestions, I suppose he would say, "It is very evident that we are going to have a war with Japan or with Mexico, and I will therefore issue an Executive order suspending the law." "Suspending" is not the word; it is "waiving"; that is, waiving the responsibility under the law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that my colleague thinks we have not the constitutional power to pass this law?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not have to invoke the Constitution; I invoke the rule of common right and justice and good sense.

Mr. BORAH. If we have not the constitutional power and should find a President who would think war imminent every day, he would do precisely as my colleague wants to do, and that is render the bill wholly inoperative. He is opposed to the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the only good thing he could do to it. If he could do that, I would make some allowance for him. My colleague, of course, does not desire to turn the force of my argument in that direction.

Mr. BORAH. The suggestion which I made was that the President, in the state of mind my colleague described the President might be, and the Senator are precisely upon the same basis; that they both would render the law inoperative. So they are going in the same direction.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am pointing out the effects of this legislation. I am perhaps dense; I do not see the point of the Senator's comparison, because I had denounced that which he would have me appear to have advocated.

Mr. BORAH. The denseness may be on my part.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not going to dwell long upon that. If it does not strike the minds of Senators at once, it never will strike them. It is a case, perhaps, where Ephraim is joined to his idols, and you had better let him alone.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the difference, practically, between this bill and the power it gives the President and, say, the corporation-tax law which attaches a penalty for the failure of a corporation to make its report by the 1st day of March—I believe it is the 1st of March—but gives the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the power to remit those penalties under certain circumstances? What is the difference between the two laws so far as the point we are now discussing is concerned?

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator mean that I indorse the one and condemn the other?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; but is there any difference between them?

Mr. HEYBURN. I condemn both. I have condemned them in speech and word in this body.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Permit me to say that a broad and distinguishing difference is that one of them is a law with reference to corporations and this is a law with reference to labor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not going to be tempted into that kind of comparisons. I do not care whether it is a law affecting labor or leisure or wealth or poverty or one man or a combination of men. So long as I act and vote in this body that question will never enter into my consideration of the question. I am not here to destroy, and I am not here to discriminate between men or measures.

Mr. CUMMINS. But my question certainly does not raise those considerations.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question of my colleague did.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the difference between the two cases is the question I put.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think there is very little difference; but inasmuch as I am opposed to one I am not here to accumulate errors. My function, so far as I make a record here, is to eliminate existing errors and avoid future ones.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask one further question? I assume, therefore, that the Senator from Idaho is opposed to the grant of power to any officer of the Government, as a district attorney to enter into a compromise with regard to fines, or the Secretary of the Treasury to do the same thing, or the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor; and there is to be no flexibility whatever with regard to penalties imposed by the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator states me correctly. I am opposed to conferring the power to administer the law to those officers. We have tribunals sufficient, and if not sufficient, capable of being made sufficient, to punish offenders against the law. To have some agent offering to compromise a penalty prescribed by law is very obnoxious to my view of the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let me ask the Senator one more question along the same line, because we ought to reach, I think, a sound conclusion about this matter. The Senator knows that in the case of the Railway Mail Service a railway company enters into a contract with the United States that it will run its trains upon a certain schedule and that if its trains do not arrive on time it will forfeit a certain amount of money for each failure to make the schedule time. Does the Senator from Idaho think that there ought not to be any power in the Post Office Department to take account of the circumstances and conditions which may make it impossible for the railway company to fulfill its schedule to the minute?

Mr. HEYBURN. If damage occurred to the Government, I would settle the question of the damages in the courts.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not a question of damage, but the law, the contract itself provides for the imposition of a penalty; and the Post Office Department constantly, under proper conditions, remits a part of that penalty where the cause of failure to fulfill the schedule was beyond the control of the railway company.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no difficulty whatever in responding to that inquiry of the Senator from Iowa; and I should like to go into that question, because I spent months and months in the consideration of such questions, with responsibility resting upon me, and I have distinct and well-digested views upon the subject. It is a great subject; it is one that goes to the question of maintaining the distinction between the branches of the Government, but it is not necessary in this case to go further than the statement of the primary principles upon which I would rest. I say that not out of any want of consideration for the question of the Senator, but because it seems to me it will unduly expand the consideration of this measure.

I do not believe the President should be given the right to suspend a law. We saw an instance of the effect of that once here within our service, where the President by a proclamation suspended what was conceded to be one of the greatest and most far-reaching pieces of legislation that Congress ever indulged in, and that was in the case of the public-land laws, where he tied up in darkness the Territory of Alaska, where he tied up and rendered unavailable and unavailing as an asset hundreds of millions of acres, where he blocked the wheels of the immigrants on the plains, or wherever they might be, as effectually as though he had crushed the spokes with the sledge; where he tied up the business enterprises of those who had located and equipped themselves, depending upon conditions that they had a right to depend upon under the law, and he sent them to bankruptcy; where he passed by a generation of the American people, took away the opportunities of a whole generation that, while the order was in force, grew too old to avail themselves of the law or were compelled to accept an alternate or a substitute that decreased and destroyed their rights under the law. By his order he closed the schoolhouses; he destroyed taxation; he destroyed home making; he stopped the growth of the country. That was by an Executive order. That ought to have been warning enough to all Senators never again to propose that the President should have the right or be allowed to suspend any law that Congress makes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to suggest to the Senator from Idaho another notable instance in which the President of the United States suspended a law duly passed, and that was in the case of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., when, without any authority whatever, he suspended the law, to the great damage of the country, permitting the Steel Trust to absorb the Tennessee Coal & Iron properties and still further to increase its power as a trust.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it was not for the purpose of arraigning any President or past President that I made this comparison. The comparison was between laws and the execution of them. I do not desire to be understood as making personal reference for the purpose of being personal, but it was necessary to refer to these acts because they were official acts. It is the act that I referred to and disapproved of, not necessarily the man who performed it. That is a different question.

Mr. President, following right on in that section you give the President the right to say when an emergency exists. That is, passing upon facts; and the party attacked would contend that no emergency existed; that his contemplated act was within the law.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest to the Senator this question: Whether his objection as to this power of the President is as forceful an objection to the measure as it would be if that provision in the measure were stricken out giving the President the power to determine emergencies? I call attention to this. Under the bill, as I understand it, the penalties are to be $5 a day in the case of each laborer where there is a violation of the law. Those penalties are fixed and determined, how? An inspector goes out and examines the work; he has to do that to see that the contract is carried out; he reports the violation to the officer who makes the payments under the contract; and the officer who makes the payments under the contract withholds from the payment this penalty. The contractor has the right to appeal from the decision of that officer to the head of the department.

If the head of the department confirms what the paymaster has decided and imposes the penalty, then the contractor or subcontractor has the right to go into the Court of Claims and sue for his money. Now, where will you leave the situation if you strike down the power lodged in the President to determine the question of an emergency? Will you not leave it in the hands of an inspector? The inspector examines the work, ascertains as to how the contract is being carried on, and finds certain violations.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can answer that in a minute.

Mr. FLETCHER. The inspector says, "Oh, I find violations of the law here, but they come within that exception specified in the act under the head of emergencies, and therefore"——

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I realize that the way to avoid being caught in the trap is not to set it. By this legislation you are setting out not only that trap, but about half a dozen others; and my argument is, Do not set the trap.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely suggest whether it would not be better to leave in the bill this authority and power in the President, than practically to leave it in the hands of an inspector or paymaster or the head of a department—one or the other?

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, I will proceed, and I will briefly answer that suggestion. The Senator suggests a plan that would constitute three or four new courts, first, the equivalent of the ordinary county or district court—that is, the appeal that he makes to the contractor—then, next, an appeal from that decision to another executive branch—nowhere to a judicial branch—and then to some other. I understand perfectly the proposed working of this law. I have had it in mind too many months for my comfort.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I only wish to say to the Senator that I am not suggesting that plan—that is, the plan provided for in the bill itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that perfectly. That is the method of procedure proposed at some times—I will not say by some people. First establish a wrong and then argue that inasmuch as the wrong exists you may enlarge it. That does not appeal to me. We are here not to defend or acknowledge the merit of the existing legislation; but I desire to say a few words in regard to that phase of this bill.

The same power that would forbid a man to work may compel him to work, and I have as authority for that the Holy Scriptures. It has often occurred to me as singular that nobody ever paid any attention to—in fact, they hurry over—that part of the commandment which says "Six days thou shalt labor." I never heard any man preach in favor of the enforcement of that part of the commandment at all, because it is not the comfortable side of it. "But on the seventh day thou shalt do no labor," or no work. That is the part that appeals to them.

Under a strict interpretation of the Biblical injunction the law ought to compel every man to work all the time for six days. A day, under the laws of nature, consists of the daylight. It is the light that makes the day; the words are synonymous in their meaning. The period of daylight is varied by the season. A wise power has provided that the sun should shine longer during those days when man's duties were more pressing, when he must raise the crops upon which to feed the world during the winter season. He needed more time to plant and cultivate them and harvest them, and the days were made longer. In the winter time it was not necessary to have such long days. I am merely making this suggestion; I am not criticizing the arrangement of the universe; it suits me, and I could not arrange it half so well [laughter], but I am calling attention to it. We are very apt to glide along through this world on false premises.

Mr. President, we have a law on the statute books that says that upon Government work 8 hours shall constitute a day's labor. I have no objection to it. The objection commences with me when you say that a man shall not be allowed to work more than 8 hours. The other applies to a contract only. It interprets the contract of the Government when it says you shall work so many hours a day. That is a contract, but when the law provides that a man shall not work more than so many hours, that is an infringement upon the liberty and the right of contract. There is a difference, and it ought not to be difficult to see it. I believe that as to men in all the walks of life—I care not whether it be the man who builds the wall or carries the hod or puts the roof on the building, or whether he is a clerk at a desk or works in any of the departments of the Government—there should be a sense of consideration and humanity enter into all dealings with him or her.

There are twenty-nine, yes, there are thirty, million people in the United States over the age of 21 years. There are that many people engaged in industrial enterprises. They are not all affected by this measure, because it applies only to Government work, but where does the line exist between Government work and other work? In the great reclamation projects of the West the men who are building the ditches—or the canals, because they are rivers, some of them, that would float ships—sublet the work by contract and the subcontractor will make a contract with the grower of hay to furnish so many tons of hay to feed the teams. Of course these are large items. Another will contract with a subcontractor to do the work, to furnish so many teams per day and so many men to manage the teams and the scrapers and the plows. It has been suggested to me that there was an exception in this bill that exempted that class of work. It does not exempt it; it may be intended to do so; but it is not properly worded to accomplish any such purpose. There is certain peculiar language used here. It is within this quotation:

> And any officer or person designated as inspector of the work to be performed under any such contract, or to aid in enforcing the fulfillment thereof, shall, upon observation or investigation, forthwith report to the proper officer of the United States, or of any Territory, or of the District of Columbia, all violations of the provisions of this act directed to be made in every such contract, together with the name of each laborer or mechanic who has been required or permitted to labor in violation of such stipulation and the day of such violation, and the amount of the penalties imposed according to the stipulation in any such contract shall be directed to be withheld for the use and benefit of the United States, the District of Columbia, or the Territory contracting by the officer or person whose duty it shall be to approve the payment of the moneys due under such contract, whether the violation of the provisions of such contract is by the contractor or any subcontractor.

That is the end of that sentence.

Any contractor or subconstractor aggrieved by the withholding of any penalty as hereinbefore provided shall have the right within six months thereafter to appeal to the head of the department making the contract on behalf of the United States.

That is where his appeal lies—not to any court. It does not lie to the President of the United States. It does not come even to the power that was spoken of by the Senator from Iowa. It is provided that he—shall have the right within six months thereafter to appeal to the head of the department making the contract on behalf of the United States or of the Territory, and in the case of a contract made by the District of Columbia to the commissioners thereof, who shall have power to review the action.

Now, there is a delegation of judicial power to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Where would they sit? When would they sit? Under what form or system would they sit to hear these men coming from Idaho, perhaps, in order to settle the differences between contractors and the heads of departments concerning the great irrigation work?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. What article or material would the Government be interested in purchasing from the farmers or anybody else which would not be articles or material to be bought in the open market?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am speaking of the contract of the subcontractor to build the canal. It does not consist in buying articles. It consists of work—excavating—to the extent of millions of dollars.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the present law cover that?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think so. I know that the present law is a good shield to go behind, but the present law does not cover that subject. It does not go to the subcontractor or the sub-subcontractor.

Mr. BORAH. It does not cover the subcontractor because it does not distinguish between contractors and subcontractors, but it covers all work upon public works. This is public work, and therefore it is immaterial whether it is the contractor or subcontractor. It has been so construed and enforced.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is being so construed by a lot of bureau employees or representatives, and it will probably be enforced until somebody gets ready to stop the hand that enforces it.

There, you see, right in the beginning arises a difference, and I need not hesitate at all on account of modesty to say between two Members of this body, each of whom is presumed to be competent to pass judgment on a matter of this kind and neither of whom will arrogate to himself the supreme wisdom that will enable him to say that the other's argument is nonsense. I will give due heed and credit to what the Senator says, but I shall also reserve my right to have an opinion of my own on this subject.

Mr. BORAH. I will say the same thing of my colleague.

Mr. HEYBURN. This shows the hotbed of controversy we are getting into. There is no crying need for it. If there were, I would be more patient with the effort, the superhuman effort, to legislate on a subject that needs no legislation. There is no demand for it except from the paid representatives of the real workingmen, and it is the snap of a whip. I do not recognize the right of any man or the representative of organized men to snap a whip at the Congress of the United States, and it will be a sad day for the Government when it shall be done. I will treat them as fairly and as liberally as I would the representatives of the biggest monopolies in the country, and I will not deal with them any more liberally or fairly. I will protect them against oppression, but I will not allow them, merely because they think they have the power, to sit above our heads and say, "We want this legislation, and we are going to have it, or we will see to it that you are defeated at the polls at the next election." That is not a good way to attempt to force good men to do anything.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The suggestion the Senator made a moment ago is one that has troubled me considerably in reference to this bill, and that is holding the contractor responsible for the acts of the subcontractor or the sub-subcontractor.

The Senator called attention to the construction of irrigation ditches in the West; the fact that they have horses, and mules, I suppose, and perhaps they have to buy hundreds and perhaps thousands of tons of hay. They have to go into the country among the farmers. The farmers ordinarily work a little over eight hours a day. I know they do in my country. And yet, if the farmers who contract to supply the hay permit their men to work a moment over eight hours in supplying that commodity, the contractor under this bill, as I read it, is held responsible for what is called illegal action on the part of the subcontractor. Am I right?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I want to assure the Senator that he is in error as to the bill in that respect.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope I am; but that is the way I read it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That depends upon the construction which would be given to the language that has been used to avoid the bad consequences of this legislation.

Mr. BORAH. That is within the power of the court in its construction of the law, and common sense will be used there just as in the case of every law passed here. There is no doubt, so far as concerns the plainness of the law. These articles, such as hay, corn, oats, and so forth, which they buy from farmers, are materials which are well established to be purchased in the open market, and they are so recognized. There are plenty of precedents for the rule that they are articles which can be purchased in the open market, and therefore they do not come under this law at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess that that does not satisfy my mind. Would the Senator argue that that would apply, as an illustration, to a case where a Government vessel was contracted for, and the lumber that entered into that vessel was engaged from a subcontractor in an adjoining State and he worked his men 9 or 10 hours a day? Would the Senator argue that this law would not apply to the subcontractor, and if he did, that the contractor would not be held subject to its fines and penalties?

Mr. BORAH. If the contractor covered that class of lumber which is sold in the open market, I have no doubt at all it would be excepted from this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is an interpretation I am glad to have the Senator state, although in the very careful reading and rereading of the bill I have been forced to the conclusion that the subcontractor in that case would be violating the law and the contractor would be held for the violation of the law by the subcontractor or the sub-subcontractor; and I think that would be an evil which we ought to obviate if we possibly can.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why should we go groping, struggling, and striving to get around these obvious and admitted difficulties in order to accomplish what? To gain the privilege to say to an American citizen that he shall not labor except with our consent? For the Government to lend its great power to the enforcement of rules that say a man shall not, when his necessities demand it, add to his income by his labor is so repugnant to every sense of freedom and enlightened civilization that I do not need to go groping about these small questions affecting the enforcement of the law. The more readily the law can be enforced the more dangerous it is. The only thing that could recommend this law to me would be that it would be incapable of enforcement. The only safety that would rest anywhere would rest there.

The Government of the United States engages in such a variety of enterprises through the system of contracts and subcontracts and sub-subcontracts that you present a very embarrassing and difficult question when you come to the enforcement of it. But we ought never to come to that point. The dearest right that the American citizen has is the right of contract. Is there a Senator here who would vote for a measure introduced for the purpose of limiting or abolishing by law the right of contract? If there is, I advise him to speak only in whispers, for the people might hear him.

No man can truthfully charge me with having at any time or now been in favor of discriminating against those who labor. The right to labor is the richest heritage of an American citizen. Every man has the right to enter the field of labor in competition with every other man and on equal terms. The declaration that all men are free and equal refers to the basic proposition of opportunity. They have the same right to take advantage of the same opportunity.

Now, Mr. President, you propose to say that one man shall say to another, "You shall not work," because if you can say it to him as to one hour you can say it to him as to two and as to all the rest. If we can say that a man shall not work more than 8 hours, we can say that he shall not work more than 1.

We can not do it without violating the very principles upon which the Government was established—without violating the very sentiment that prompted its establishment.

So that while at first I devoted my attention to the manner of the execution of this law, I come back to the primary principle. Suppose we were to enact a law that said the Government might compel men to work and fixed their hours. What a cry would go up against legislative interference with the right of contract, and yet there is as much reason why the Government might do that as there is why it should say that a man should not work.

We have now prohibited the sturdy, robust young men of 12 and 13 and 14 years of age from participating in the support of the families of which they are members. Why? For the benefit of those young men? No man will dare to claim that; but in order to lessen the supply of labor in the interest of the agitators. That is why we did it, and I have not to carry on my shoulders the sin of participating in that kind of legislation, merely because there was a hue and cry for it. There was no demand from the widows and the disabled people of the country who depend upon their children under the age which we fixed in that legislation, that we forbid by law these robust and capable supporters from performing their duty. There came to the Senate no petition from those mothers and dependent relatives and old people asking for that legislation. There were no petitions from them, and there are no petitions from that generation represented by the young men between 12 and 15 years asking that they be relieved from the performance of their share in support of the family. Did it never occur to Senators that we should have heard through some means from that class of people? No. We were hearing from the class of people who limit the apprentices in the fields of industry through a selfish purpose of enabling them more easily to control the field of labor within their own limits. It came from the same source.

I have no objection to organized labor. The name never has any terrors for me. I want to know for what purpose they organize and how they propose to effectuate their purpose, and if it appeals to me as fair among men, organized labor can count upon me as true and stanch a friend as they have in the world. But I am going to proceed upon my judgment in a matter where I am to act responsibly. I am not going to take the judgment roll of those organizations as a verity where I am responsible.

No, Mr. President; the purpose of this bill is to diminish the opportunities of men to engage in gainful enterprise, regardless of their willingness or their strength so to do.

Mr. President, there is a provision that I passed over which allows the President subsequently to——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator submit to an interruption? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 18642. Before the unfinished business is proceeded with, the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON IMPROVEMENT & DEVELOPMENT CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) to declare and make certain the authority of the Attorney General to begin and maintain and of any court of competent jurisdiction to entertain and decide a suit or suits for the purpose of having judicially declared a forfeiture of the rights granted by the act entitled "An act granting to the Washington Improvement & Development Co. a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington," approved June 4, 1898, which was, on page 4, at the end of line 10, to insert:

Each of said companies, as a condition precedent to approval of its right of way hereunder, shall pay such compensation for the taking or damaging of land and improvements of Indian allottees as the Secretary of the Interior shall find to be justly due from and hitherto unpaid by such company; and each of said rights of way is hereby expressly declared to be subject to the condition that so much thereof as shall not have been occupied by a completed railway at the expiration of five years from and after the date of the approval thereof under this act by the Secretary of the Interior shall ipso facto revert to the United States without any act of reentry or judicial or legislative declaration of forfeiture.

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that may lie over until tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will lie on the table without objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to look at it.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 21969. An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

SAVANNAH RIVER DAMS.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5930) to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of the proviso beginning with the words "Provided further," page 1, line 13, down to and including the word "Engineers," page 2, line 8, so that the bill will read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted for the extension of the time allowed to the Twin City Power Co. to construct dams across the Savannah River, authorized by the act of February 29, 1908, until three years from the date fixed in the original act for its completion, to wit, February 29, 1916: Provided, That under the approval of the Secretary of War upon plans and specifications to be submitted, the said corporation may at its option develop its contemplated water power by the construction of one dam in lieu of two.

"SEC. 2. That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

And the House agree to the same.

CHOCTAW AND CREEK TREATY LANDS.

Mr. CURTIS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16661) to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians under or by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on March 24, 1832, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the United States of America hereby forever relinquishes, releases, and quitclaims all right, title, and interest in and to all the lands now held under claim or color of title by individual or private ownership or municipal ownership and situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians or any member or members thereof, under and by virtue of the treaties entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on the 9th day of August, 1814, and at Washington on the 24th day of March, 1832, by which all the lands of said Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians east of the Mississippi River were ceded to the United States of America, as well as all lands so situated in the State of Alabama which may have been sold by the United States of America or under the authority of the same for the benefit of or in behalf of any Creek Indian or Indians, whether the conditions or reservations of sales were complied with or not, and whether or not patents were issued therefor by the United States; and in cases where patents have not been issued under the treaties aforesaid, the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause to be made upon the records of their respective offices proper notations referring to this act and closing the cases: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect or dispose of any right, claim, or title, if any, which any Indian of said Creek Tribe, or his or her heir or heirs, may have in or to any of said land.

"The true intent of this act is hereby declared to be to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true and lawful owners of said lands under the laws of Alabama, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of said interest, title, and estate of the said United States."

Amend the itle by adding at the conclusion thereof the following: "and under and by virtue of the treaty between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians of the 9th day of August, 1814."

And the Senate agree to the same.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield the floor?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I understand when the unfinished business comes up it takes a Senator from the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not take him from the floor. It substitutes some other business, but it does not take the Senator from the floor. Of course, the matters which the Chair has laid down the Chair has a right to lay down at any time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that it took me from the floor. I understand that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has given notice that at this hour he will speak upon the pending measure, and I, of course, yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair desired to know.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I approach the discussion of any matter with reference to tariff legislation with some hesitancy. I listened for three or four days to probably one of the most exhaustive and carefully prepared addresses upon the steel and metal schedule that has ever been delivered in the United States Senate. It showed the most thorough research and gave to the Senate a vast fund of information on this schedule. There were comparatively few Senators who listened to the address given by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I presume that a reasonable number of them will read it if they have time.

Glancing, however, at the bill itself, I am rather constrained to believe that it was never intended to have a great deal of consideration. Certainly it received none in the House, and the only consideration in the Senate which was given it has been given by members of the Finance Committee and by one or two other Senators. I desire, however, to cover some features in the discussion of the bill that have not been considered to any great extent.

We took considerable evidence before the Finance Committee. The addresses that have been made so far have referred almost exclusively to some record evidence from the department. The evidence obtained by the committee bore upon the three propositions, namely, the cost of production at home and abroad and the difference in the wages of employees at home and abroad and the effect of this legislation upon each and every one of the several paragraphs constituting the metal schedule.

I will not attempt to go into the details of the matter with the thoroughness which was exemplified in the discussion by the Senator from Utah, but I will quote more fully from the testimony taken before the committee.

Mr. President, during the summer of 1909 the Finance Committee, of which I was a member, labored very many weary days and long nights in securing testimony upon every phase of the tariff schedules.

The information which was received was for the most part received from those who were experts in the particular lines upon which they gave their testimony.

The bill which was reported from the Finance Committee was a fair expression of the evidence on which it was based. Representing a party whose cardinal policy was protection, we sought to retain the protective principle in that bill. Measured by the testimony which was before the committee, we did not believe that the duties were in any cases excessive. We did believe they were sufficient, and we intended that they should be. In many schedules there was a very marked reduction. This was especially true with reference to the metal schedule. The woolen and cotton schedules remained practically unchanged. There were reductions in certain lines and slight raises in others. Many new fabrics had come into existence since the preceding tariff enactment, and by studied efforts to avoid some of the specific rates costly articles were being entered at our customhouses and were receiving a rating wholly inadequate, either for purposes of protection or revenue. By court decisions the most expensive and luxurious fabrics were being taxed at our ports at less tariff rates than were paid upon much cheaper articles of ordinary use. In order to place these articles in their proper classes it was necessary to make the duties on a few of them greater than that which had been required under court construction. This was not an increase in the proper sense of that word.

No sooner was this bill reported to the Senate than a violent and systematic war was waged against it. There were three principal reasons for this assault and for the violent manner in which it was pressed and which, Mr. President, I shall mention in the order of their importance:

The first and most important cause was the attitude of the American Publishers' Association. The Finance Committee and the administration were given to understand that the great press of the country, including magazines and other periodicals, were determined to secure free print paper. If they were given that, well and good. If they were denied it, the Republican Party and the administration should pay the penalty. No one doubted their power. It was simply a question of whether right should surrender to might. It mattered little that these journals might be making from 25 to 100 per cent on their investment and the average returns upon the investment of the paper manufacturers from 6 to 10 per cent. The undeniable fact still remained that several million dollars would be saved to the publishers, at least it so appeared, if free paper could be secured, and the publishers demanded that as the price of their friendship.

After a most careful consideration, the Senate Committee on Finance believed that while a reduction could be made on print paper without any great danger, it would be a rank injustice to the paper manufacturers to give them absolutely no protection, and especially so in the face of the fact that the wood cost more, that the pulp cost more, than in Canada, and that they could not secure free wood or pulp from Canada and thereby be placed upon equal terms with the Canadian manufacturer.

Print paper, however, was reduced from $6 to $3.75 per ton. This reduction was not accepted by the representatives of the Publishers' Association, and the association made good its threat. No one, of course, could doubt the result. As against an army, armed with Maxims and rapid-firing guns, the unarmed Republican Party, without any weapon of defense, was everywhere slaughtered.

The second cause of this assault was the growing factional difference in the personnel of the Republican Party. The minority leaders of that party saw an opportunity for an aggressive and probably successful battle against the majority. The rapid development of the country, with its abnormal prosperity during the preceding 10 years, opened up wonderful fields of speculation. Without proper or sufficient laws to guard against them, great combinations of industries, controlling markets and fixing the prices of their commodities at the limit of consuming ability, came into existence. Millionaires and multimillionaires increased by the thousands. An era of riotous living was indulged in generally by the American people. The public became apprehensive of danger. It was not that they were then suffering, but that the great combinations were becoming all powerful and might some day exercise that power to their great detriment.

It was but natural that this condition should be seized upon by the minority and that advantage should be taken of the public sentiment and apprehension to gain political advantage. And so we found a certain element of the party of protection assaulting the citadel of their ancient faith with far greater bitterness than had ever been shown by the old enemy of the party. There is no strife that is so bitter as factional strife. There is no adherent of any faith so zealous as the new convert.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Dakota has just said that the element known as the Progressives or the Insurgents assaulted the citadel of protection with an energy and a malignance never exhibited by our friends on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not say "malignance"; I said "bitterness."

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I will substitute bitterness for malignance. I rose to ask what the Senator from North Dakota means by the citadel of protection. Does he mean the bill that was passed and became a law in 1909, or some particular part of that law, or does he mean the doctrine of protection itself?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the assault which was made in the Congress of the United States was made by those who professed and, I believe, sincerely stand by the doctrine of protection; but in their energy and in the feeling of animosity against the particular bill very many of them bolstered up their cases with an argument that was as near free-trade argument as ever came from the rankest free trader in the whole country. When I am speaking of the minority of the party or a faction of the party, I am not speaking of those wholly within this Chamber or within the other Chamber. When we got outside of Congress we found as a result of these arguments the greatest free-trade sentiment over the country that it had had since prior to the Civil War, and that sentiment was created by the press of the country and by those who so zealously made their assaults upon that particular bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to keep history as straight as possible. Speaking in behalf of those who in the Chamber opposed the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, I desire to say that I have never heard one of them nor anyone allied with them outside the Chamber utter a single word that could by any possibility be construed into a repudiation of the doctrine of protection. I have heard the most energetic, emphatic, and, I believe, sincere protests from all these men against the embodiment of that doctrine as found in the Payne-Aldrich law.

I hope my friend from North Dakota will make the distinction that I have just suggested. I myself believe that the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was one of the most unfortunate assaults upon the doctrine of protection ever entered upon our statute books. I have just the same high regard, the same deep veneration, the same profound confidence in the wisdom of the principle or policy itself as has the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am wondering what the Senator thinks of the Dingley tariff law, the law that gave greater prosperity to the United States than any other that was ever passed by any Congress. That was a higher tariff law in many respects than the Payne-Aldrich bill. We did not suffer particularly under that law. As a whole, the people were better off under that law than we ever were before, and probably better off than we will ever be again under any other kind of a law.

The Senator from Iowa and myself stand exactly the same upon one proposition. I have heard him say again and again that he believed the tariff duties ought to be such as to give honest protection to every American industry, and yet not high enough to preclude the introduction of foreign goods in the case of combination or in case any American manufacturer of like goods should raise his prices to an exorbitant degree. We agree exactly upon that.

If there is any disagreement whatever between us, it is possibly a disagreement on evidence alone, or it may be that where there is doubt I will always resolve that doubt in favor of the American manufacturer, while the Senator from Iowa may not be as favorably disposed to resolving it in favor of the American as against the foreign producer. But I think, upon the whole, there is no distinction between Republicans. There is no one who supported the Payne-Aldrich bill, on the other hand, who ever once declared that he believed in a rate of duty that would be exorbitant. So our differences were always differences upon the question of what should be a fair measure of protection. The differences were honest differences; yet I can not help but say that those who felt it was their duty to destroy that bill assaulted it not alone with carefully considered, reasonable, and judicious utterances, but with such vehement and often irrational condemnation that they created a sentiment over the entire country, not that the tariff duties were not sufficiently lowered, but that they were actually raised far above the previous tariff act.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know to whom the Senator from North Dakota refers when he says that we who are opposed to the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, or those who were opposed to the Payne-Aldrich law, asserted that there were no reductions in it. I have said often in this Chamber that, taken as a whole, there was a slight reduction, a reduction of a little less than 2 per cent, as I now recall. That is not the point. We left here in 1909, having recorded our votes with respect to that legislation, and personally I did not invite the reopening of the hostilities at that time. The Senator from North Dakota, however, will not forget that within a very few weeks after Congress had adjourned the Chief Executive, who signed the Payne-Aldrich law, in a speech delivered in Minnesota, said substantially that every Senator who voted against the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was disloyal to the Republican Party and unfaithful to its principles. Then began this bitter controversy, of which my friend the Senator from North Dakota has spoken. I deplored that utterance quite as much as anyone could who was in sympathy with the Payne-Aldrich bill.

I propose to answer the Senator's question with regard to the Dingley law. I was not in Congress at the time the Dingley law was passed; I do not pretend to have the accuracy of information concerning conditions as they then existed which undoubtedly the Senator from North Dakota has, and which other men have who were then Members of Congress; but I do know that when 1901 came the Dingley law had become indefensible in many respects. I am one who believes that out of the Dingley law there did come very great prosperity for the American people. I believe it restored confidence in our manufactures and confidence in our commerce, so that the people again went forward with spirit and with encouragement, but the excesses of the Dingley law were not necessary in order to create that confidence and to inspire that courage. I believe that if the metal schedule had been fashioned as it should have been in 1901 or in 1900, the United States Steel Corporation would never have been organized. I believe if the very high and extraordinary duties which had been put upon the very materials that we are now considering, those embraced in the metal schedule, had not been put there, but that if a fair protective duty alone had been attached to those commodities, we would not be now considering the embarrassment so well set out and so well expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] yesterday, namely, the embarrassment caused by the disparity between the cost of producing on the part of a great combination like the United States Steel Corporation and its rivals of lesser capital and of fewer advantages. That is my idea, Mr. President, with regard to the Dingley tariff law.

I admit the advantages that law brought to the American people, but those advantages did not necessitate the disadvantages and the injuries which it at the same time inflicted upon the people because its duties were too high or had become too high as early, at least, as 1901.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad, Mr. President, that the Senator from Iowa does agree, however, that the Dingley tariff law was a fairly good law; that it did bring to this country the greatest prosperity that we have ever known; and in giving my judgment upon any law I have to base it upon the general effect of the whole law, and not upon some particular item in the law where the duties imposed might have been too great, and that act did bring us out of the worst depression we have known in recent years into the highest degree of progress and prosperity we have ever known. The Senator, however, made the broad statement that the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act was the worst that has ever been enacted, and I assume that when he says the worst one, he means that the duties levied under it were the highest. I simply desired to call his attention to the fact that the highest tariff duties that we have had for some years were in the Dingley law, and that law gave us the very greatest industrial prosperity.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not now remember that I ever said that the Payne-Aldrich law was the worst tariff law which was ever passed, certainly not in that absolute sense. I have often said that, measured by our promise in 1908, measured by the conditions as they existed in 1909, the Payne-Aldrich law was not a faithful compliance with or a fulfillment of our promise under the conditions as they then existed. I recognize, of course, that there are some things at least in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law upon which the duties are lower than they were in the Dingley law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not going into any controversy about what the President of the United States has said or what he has not said with reference to any tariff legislation. I have not been a follower of the administration on all occasions, as the Senator from Iowa well knows. I do not follow any administration, nor allow the beck of the President of the United States to govern me in my convictions of what ought to be in our legislation. Whatever view the President of the United States might hold upon tariff legislation, I should not yield my own judgment, formed upon my own investigation, any more than I would upon his view as to whether we ought to have had Canadian reciprocity as the law of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa is mistaken when he says that the real battle and the vitriolic sentiment that was expressed against this law began after the President had made some remarks concerning it. It began in the press the very moment the bill came back into the Senate without free print paper, and it never ceased until after the election of 1910. We were never able to get the truth of that bill before the public or to explain what it did mean. Ninety per cent of the people of the United States believed that there had been a great increase of tariff duties under the Payne-Aldrich bill. The Senator from Iowa knew that that was not so, and I knew it, but we could not change the sentiment of the public, because we could not secure a fair presentment by the press.

It was but natural, Mr. President, with the press of the country against the Republican Party, with one faction of the party attempting to overthrow the other, that we should have gone down to defeat along the line. There is no denial of the fact that factional politics played a greater part in the disastrous result to the Republican Party in 1910 than all of the arguments that were ever made by the Democratic Party against the Republican Party. I agree with the Senator from Iowa that I want to see that chasm bridged between those factions of the Republican Party. I have had the hope when we should secure from a commission a report as to the cost of production at home and abroad and all other data relating to our tariffs—something that even the newspapers of the country probably would not assail as incorrect—that we would have a basis upon which Republicans could get together, and that we could make a tariff bill in conformity with it. I am afraid that we shall not soon reach that hoped for condition because of a failure to continue the good work of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. President, another factor which added fuel to the flame of internecine battle at that time shows how an inadvertent sentence, or, rather, a sentence misconstrued, will raise a national storm. In the opening of the debate upon the tariff bill the Senator having that bill in charge said to the Senate that the tariff plank of the Republican platform of 1908 was not a promise for reduction, but simply a promise for revision. That sentence was printed in glaring headlines in every daily newspaper throughout the country in their next issue, and upon that sentence it was predicated that the Finance Committee had followed that construction in reporting a tariff bill to the Senate. As a matter of fact, the majority members of the Finance Committee never gave the tariff plank that construction. Every member of that committee, I believe, construed that plank to mean that we should make a reduction all along the line so far as it could be made consistent with the protective policy of this country.

Mr. SMOOT. Outside of luxuries.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, in the matter of luxuries, we have always imposed on them a high tariff. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the tariff was reduced; and I want to take that question up with the Senator from Iowa, who says that there was a reduction of about 2 per cent. The report that accompanied the tariff bill into the Senate from the Finance Committee clearly and accurately expressed the reductions and exactly what had been done in the following words:

Tariff decreases on goods which the bulk of the people purchase generally affected articles of the value of $4,951,813,175. The tariff increases on goods, outside of those that were purely luxuries and liquors, affected articles of the value of $240,852,525. The decreases, outside of champagnes and other liquors, were twenty-one times greater than the increases, considering the value of the goods upon which the duties operated.

Those increases, Mr. President, stand as a clear refutation of the false claim that the tariff law of 1909 did not decrease duties on the bulk of the articles purchased by the American people.

I prepared during the debate upon that subject a table showing the actual decreases upon articles of ordinary consumption in the United States, and, with the consent of the Senate, I will make that table a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the insertion of the table I want to say, first, that it covers all agricultural implements; baking soda; petroleum; linseed oil; red lead; white lead; varnishes; cement; brick; Rockingham ware; window glass; bar iron generally used by blacksmiths; steel beams and girders; hoop and band iron; railroad rails; sheet iron; sheet iron or steel, galvanized; steel wires; barbed wire; hammers; sledges; bolts and nuts; knives; files; nails, spikes, etc.; horse and mule shoes; wire nails; tacks; brads; rivets; screws; saws; sewing machines; typewriters; oilcloths; silks; coal; print paper; hats and bonnets; boots and shoes; leather, sole and belting; leather for shoes; gloves, generally used; harness; saddles; cotton thread; cotton clothing; woolen clothing; sugar; etc.—covering almost every article of ordinary consumption.

The table referred to is as follows:

Reduction on existing law of articles generally purchased.

	Per cent reduction of existing tariff.
Agricultural implements:
Wagons	25
Mowers	25
Binders	25
Harrows	25
Drills	25
Thrashers' machinery	25
Rakes	25
Plows	25
Cultivators	25
Planters	25
All other kinds of agricultural implements	25
(Administrative features of bill provide for no duty from countries not imposing duty on American machinery.)
Soda, baking	No change.
Oil, petroleum (all duties taken off)	Free.
Linseed oil, all kinds	25
Red lead for paint	9
White lead for paint	13
Varnishes	20 to 48
Cement	No change.
Brick, glazed	22
Rockingham earthenware and china, the kind in common use	28 to 33
Window glass, common	4 to 20
Bar iron generally used by blacksmiths	50
Steel beams and girders for buildings (not assembled)	20
Hoop and band iron	40
Railroad rails	50
Sheet iron and steel	28
Sheet iron or steel, galvanized	23
Sheet iron, polished	25
Steel wires, various sizes	12 to 20
Barbed wire for fence	37
Hammers, sledges, crowbars, etc	8
Bolts and nuts	25
Knives and forks, table, commonly used	13 to 26
Files	5 to 25
Nails, spikes, etc	33
Horse and mule shoes	25
Nails, wire	20
Tacks, brads, etc	50
Rivets	37
Saws, common hand	16
Screws	16 to 25
Sewing machines	14
Typewriters	14
Oilcloths, linoleums, etc., for floors	9 to 38
Oilcloths for tables, covers, etc	40
Silks, commonly used	10
Coal, bituminous	33
Print paper	37
Hats, bonnets, etc., commonly used	20
Boots and shoes	40
Leather, sole and belting	75
Leather for shoe uppers, etc	25
Gloves, generally used	30
Harness, saddles, etc	55
Cotton thread	16 to 20
Cotton clothing, underwear, etc	No material change.
Woolen clothing and underwear	No material change.
Sugar:
Philippine sugar (free)	100
Sugar from Cuba	20
Other sugar	Very slight reduction.
Lumber:
Timber, round	50
Lumber, whitewood, basswood, etc	50
All other lumber—
Rough sawed	37
Finished 1 side	30
Finished 2 sides	33
Finished 4 sides	30
Finished 1 side and tongued and grooved	33
Finished 2 sides and tongued and grooved	33
Fence posts (free)	100
Lath	20
Shingles raised from 30 cents to 50 cents per thousand.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course these reductions made no change in the selling price to the consumer. Why? Because tariff levied upon original value is such a small percentage of the selling price that it is generally too insignificant a factor to be taken into consideration. The tariff is based upon the price of an article as it comes fresh from the factory. After that its cost is enhanced by freights, storage, insurance, handling, boxing, shipping, distributing, commissions, wholesalers' profits, retailers' profits, clerks' salaries, rents, all overhead charges, interest on borrowed money, delivery costs, including horses' board, stabling, drivers, and so forth.

It is not surprising that when the article reaches the consumer its selling price is from 2 to 10 times its factory price.

This was the truth; but it was impossible to get that fact before the public. If any portion of this truth by any chance got into the press one day, it was denied the very next day and its effect entirely destroyed. Truth was crushed to earth. It has been slowly—very slowly, indeed—rising again. In the decrease in the rate on all our importations we will find a manifestation of this reduction. The value of all the importations and the amounts received by the Government in duties show reductions as follows; and I want Senators who deny that the American people got any benefit from the reductions in the tariff of 1909 to listen to this if, indeed, increased importations can be justly said to be beneficial: In 1899, under the Dingley law, the average ad valorem duty on all goods imported was 29.49 per cent; in 1908, the year prior to the tariff law of 1909, the amount was 24.22 per cent; in 1910 it was 21.11 per cent; and in 1911 it was 20.29 per cent—a decrease since 1899 of over 35 per cent.

These figures, Mr. President, place the stamp of falsity on every utterance made by press and orator that the effect of the tariff law of 1909 was not a reduction.

Another strong evidential fact of reduction is that the year before the tariff act went into effect, in 1908, the total amount of importations was $1,183,120,665. In 1910, the year after this law went into effect, the importations were increased to $1,547,109,137, or an increase of $363,988,472 in one year. In other words, we did let down the bars sufficiently to allow to come into this country nearly $364,000,000 worth of goods more than came into it the preceding year; that many dollars worth of foreign goods took the place of that many dollars worth of goods made by Americans and were consumed in our own country; that many dollars worth of imported goods over and above the previous year indicates a considerable percentage of reduction in the earning capacity of the American workman for that year. In 1911 the importations were substantially the same.

Mr. President, the campaign following the revision of the tariff in 1909 was, I am free to say, one of the most unfair that I have ever known in my life. Men in the Senate and in the House were singled out and made monsters of iniquity, and the virtue of every other man by the press was measured by the number of times, upon the hundreds of amendments offered, that his vote happened to be the same as that of either of the individuals so singled out, one in the House and one in the Senate. Amendments were offered, for instance, placing a whole schedule upon the free list, and if any man voted against them he was by the press published as a monster and as betraying the interests of his constituents. Had the Senators voted the way the press said they should have voted, there would not have been one dollar of revenue raised under the act of 1909 to carry on the Government. Everything would have been on the free list. Even one of our "insurgents"—a very ardent and a very good one—was found by one of the great periodicals to be only 49 per cent pure and 51 per cent bad, because, upon a very careful computation, it was found that 49 per cent of his votes were the same as those of the then Senator from Rhode Island, and only 51 per cent of them were the other way. Tables of that kind were made up and scattered over the entire country and used by a faction in one party to attempt to destroy candidates in the other faction of their own party. That is the character of the warfare that was indulged in in the campaign of 1910. Why, Mr. President, the only virtue, according to the press, was cowardice and subserviency to its dictates, and the only crime that a Representative could commit was that of being courageous enough to stand up to his honest convictions upon any matter.

I know it is never too late to learn, and I learned a lesson in the campaign of 1910. I learned how feeble is the element of truth as an effective weapon in a poisoned atmosphere. As I look over the list of the fallen in the campaign of 1910, while my confidence in the old proverb that truth will prevail in the end has not been wholly shaken, I must admit that I believe that very many good men must go down to political death in order to establish that truth.

Mr. President, study this bill as you will and you study in vain to find any system, any logic, any consideration of cause or effect. It is neither a protective measure nor a revenue measure. It is a sort of hit-or-miss affair. We will find one section in which a strained effort is made to reduce the cost of fishhooks, which can already be bought for a few cents a bushel, and the next section will allow millions of revenue to slip away without benefiting the public in any way.

The only glimmer of a design anywhere apparent in the bill is a seeming attempt to punish the audacity of manufacturers who have dared to take a chance at establishing a business enterprise. There seems to be a purpose to strike them going and coming. The bill places a duty on the articles which they must purchase abroad because not produced in this country and which are necessary ingredients of their products, seemingly for the purpose of adding to their cost of production, and then lowers the protection heretofore received by them, for the seeming purpose of destroying their prosperity.

And why this antipathy? Why this punishment? It is true that during a period of the greatest prosperity any country has ever known, between 1897 and 1907, when both prosperity and its side partner, speculation, ran riot, some great industrial combinations issued watered stock and found so much money in the country that they easily unloaded it. And for this offense of the few the whole country is to be punished; for the offense committed by one man a thousand innocent men are to be executed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to call the attention of the Senator to one small item in this bill, and what I am about to say is to a large extent true of almost every item covering the smaller manufacturers.

In my State we have a cutlery establishment. At the head of it is ex-Gov. D. H. Goodell, one of our best citizens. I wrote him about the business, inquiring how he was getting along. He has built up a prosperous community, the houses mostly being owned by the operatives. It is a beautiful little New Hampshire country village. Gov. Goodell wrote me as follows:

> A few years ago peculiar circumstances gave me an opportunity to learn about how much common table cutlery, carving knives, butcher, kitchen, and shoe knives were made in this country, and I was surprised to find that the whole amount of all makers' production was less than $1,000,000. This was before the 1907 panic. Since that time the trade has been slack and prices so low that some have already gone out of business. I understand that cutlery importations have been increasing all the time. If any material reduction in the tariff on table cutlery should be made the business must be ruined. As conditions and prospects are now we would gladly sell our cutlery business at a price far below cost. We ought to make all our table cutlery in this country instead of importing more than one-half of what is used.

I turn to the official documents and I find that while prior to 1907 there were less than a million dollars of that class of cutlery made in this country, and there is no evidence it has greatly increased, we imported cutlery in 1910 to the extent of $1,817,210 and in 1911 to the amount of $1,924,414, an increase of 9 per cent. Yet in the face of that this bill, which the Senator is so ably discussing, reduces the tariff on penknives, pocketknives, pruning knives, and so forth, from 77.62 to 35 per cent; and on table cutlery, cooking utensils, and so forth, from 43.43 to 25 per cent. So that while this industry, which in a sense is important and it is characteristic of a great many other lines of industry, is now dragging along, with importations almost twice the entire domestic production, the proposition is to make a cut of almost one-half in the present tariff rates.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will be able to show to the Senator passages from the testimony given by a great many men showing it would be impossible for them to continue business under the proposed rates, and I shall supplement that before I get through by showing the cost of production at home and abroad, and demonstrating why it is impossible for any American producer to continue if the reduction is made as contemplated in the bill.

I voted with the majority of the committee to report this bill adversely, not that I could say there was not a single item in the bill that could not be lowered somewhat without any great danger, but that they were so few and so scattering that they need hardly be taken into consideration. I voted adversely to it because it was illogical. I voted adversely to it because it was neither a protective measure nor a revenue producer. It is a hybrid that seemed to have no other purpose than to slash into an industry or to destroy the prosperity of the manufacturers of iron and steel in the United States.

I opposed it also because three years ago we made a very radical reduction in the steel schedule, below that of any other schedule, and the figures of which I have already given.

I opposed it also because all the evidence we had before us established the fact that if we reduced the rates our manufacturers would either have to go to the wall, cease manufacturing, or the wages of their workmen would have to go down.

I opposed it also because Congress had created a Tariff Commission to investigate this very subject and to give us the data relative to cost of production at home and abroad, and such other data as will enable us to conform our tariffs to what is a just and reasonable protection; because that commission is at work on this schedule and it should not be changed until that reliable data is at hand, upon which we could make a bill which would satisfy the American people. In my opinion the vast majority of our people believe in protection. All they demand is that it shall be adequate, but not exorbitant.

That commission has been at work. It has made its report upon the principal schedules against which the greatest amount of condemnation was aimed. It took those up first because we thought, owing to the special complaint against them, we ought to first consider them. Those, however, have been laid aside by the House to be last considered. Why? Because the tariff report indicates that there were no very great mistakes made either upon the cotton or the wool schedule; that there were very few if any rates which might be called excessive.

Mr. President, the tariff question more than almost any other character of legislation is a technical one, is one requiring expert knowledge and study. In a general sense we understand what is meant by tariff for protection or tariff for revenue. But how to apply either policy with exact justice to any industry is a question requiring most careful investigation. It is because of this that the public can be most easily misled and deceived as to the effect of any tariff measure.

Take, for instance, the metal schedule. If an article like steel rails costs $18 per ton to manufacture in Germany and $22 per ton in the United States, those who believe that the measure of protection should be the difference between cost of production at home and abroad would have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the duty should be $4 per ton.

Upon the face of it it would be a simple proposition. In practice very many factors would be immediately met with which would have to be taken into consideration.

If we proceed upon the protective idea, then the question is not necessarily, What is the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, but what protection is necessary at any particular point or field of consumption in the United States?

Second. We would then be compelled to investigate the question of freight rates between the foreign country and New York. But the particular article may not find its market in New York. Then we must go further and ascertain what it costs to put that article in the field of consumption.

Third. We would then be compelled to ascertain the freight rates from the principal point of production in the United States to the same field of consumption.

Fourth. That would necessitate an investigation into the comparative outgoing and incoming freights. In other words, we might have to ascertain whether the freights on foreign products into a given district are the same as from the place of manufacture in this country to the same district.

Fifth. We might then be compelled to compare ocean freights to the Pacific Ocean with inland freights to the Pacific Ocean.

Sixth. We would then be immediately brought face to face with the fact that if we made the tariff high enough to give our people the Pacific coast trade, it would be so high as to amount to a prohibition in other sections of the country.

Seventh. We are then compelled to make an investigation into the ingredients that are necessary in the manufacture of steel. We find that under the old law under which we based the cost of the product ferromanganese was carried at a low tariff. Under the proposed law it is taxed much higher, and we must ascertain to what extent that extra tax will add to the cost of production.

Eighth. We may find upon investigation that some one great industry like the United States Steel Trust has a monopoly of the ferromanganese produced in this country. And if we levy a higher tariff upon the foreign product we give them a greater monopoly, and while they will not be injured, the weaker companies might be seriously affected.

Ninth. A further investigation may establish the fact that the United States Steel Corporation needs no protection whatever upon the production of pig iron and possibly steel rails, but that all of the other great industries of the country, not being so favorably situated as the United States Steel Corporation, would go to the wall without such protection.

Tenth. Nor would we be limited to our internal trade in order to determine the propriety, the necessity, or the amount of tariff that should be levied. Our export trade in the product and to what extent we should be able to compete with other countries would become an important factor.

Eleventh. Following this investigation we might find that on account of our proximity to the Canadian fields of consumption, water transportation in our favor as against land transportation for the foreign manufacturer, nearness to the field of consumption, and the readiness with which we could fill an order might give us that Canadian trade, even though our cost of production is very much more than the foreign cost. The British manufacturer would be compelled to unload his product at a given port in Canada, and that we could take ours from Chicago by the Great Lakes and reach northwestern Canada, which is demanding so much of the steel rails to-day, and on account of this water transportation we could compete with Great Britain, although her prices were very much lower than our general prices.

We must also take into consideration the proximity to the field of consumption—our ability to be on hand, our ability to answer an order immediately that a foreign producer might not be able to answer. All of those questions must be considered over and above the mere matter of the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

Now, if we should carry this along a little further we come to the twelfth proposition, and that is the question of rebates. We might find, for instance, that although the cost of production in Great Britain or Germany might not be more than 20 per cent less than the cost of production in this country; that notwithstanding that fact a bounty is given upon exports, which might be 20 or 30 or 40 per cent more, and those bounties must all be taken into consideration in fixing a proper rate.

If we investigate the cutlery business we must first make a careful investigation into the wages paid American workmen in our shops, the cost of production of an article in this country, the wages paid laborers in the foreign country, and the cost of production there.

And still we would not have sufficient or proper information if we stopped at this point. A further investigation will show that the shop cost of manufacture of the two countries does not cover the subject, because in this country all of the labor is performed in the manufacturing establishments, and practically all by men. If we go to Germany, we will find that a large share of the work is done under what is called the cottage system—men, women, and children taking the parts to their homes, assembling them, and doing considerable of the work in the matter of manufacture at very low wages and at much less expense than the same work could be done in the shops even in the foreign countries.

If we take the manufacture of chains in England and compare it with the manufacture in the United States, we will find that while the shop costs in England, compared with the shop costs in the United States, are very much lower, still a further investigation would disclose that the average cost to the foreign producer is much less than the average shop cost there, because much of the assembling and much of the work performed in the manufacture of these chains is carried on under the same cottage system, and this is true in a great number of manufactures in which the parts must be assembled and in which considerable advancement toward completed manufacture may be done in the evening at the cottage fireside.

These, Mr. President, are but a few of many things that must be investigated and weighed in arriving at a conclusion in fixing tariff rates. I mention them only to show the complexity of the question, to foreshadow the impropriety and disastrous result that must naturally follow too great a reduction.

I am opposed to the modification of the present duties on the metal schedule. Before another year, if the Tariff Commission is allowed to proceed in its investigations, we shall have before us reliable data on which to base a revision. With an average reduction of about 25 per cent duty on the metal schedule of three years ago we can well await the report of this commission before proceeding to disturb the whole steel industrial condition of the country.

If, however, I am compelled to pass judgment upon each item of this schedule before the report of this Tariff Commission is submitted, I must accept as the basis of my judgment the evidence taken before the Finance Committee. As the testimony comes from those who are interested in the business of manufacturing, I would not be as well satisfied with it as I would with the report of the commission. I must accept it, however, as it is.

And upon that testimony and in the light of facts established in the hearings I will proceed to consider whether or not that testimony affords justification for any reduction of duties upon the principal steel products. I will consider each paragraph in its order.

I want to consider them in reference to three propositions: The cost of labor in the two countries, the general cost of production in the two countries, and the effect of the bill upon the business in this country. I will take up the first paragraph, which is pig iron, scrap iron, and so forth. The present ad valorem duty on pig iron is 14.82 per cent. The proposed duty is 8 per cent. The production of pig iron, ferromanganese, and ferro-silicon in the United States is, in tons, 27,303,567, the importation into the United States for consumption was 200,970 tons. The value of imports was $5,961,688. The duty collected was $573,282, a very considerable income for the Government upon one single paragraph of a schedule. These importations show that the foreigner can compete with us and compete to a fairly respectable extent with a duty of 14.82 per cent. Give him now an advantage of a reduction to 8 per cent and it will be profitable for him to enormously increase his importations. Every dollar imported means not only a dollar less paid to the American laborer, but a dollar sent out of the country.

The advocates of this measure are not satisfied with a reduction in the protection of nearly one-half, but they more than double the rate on ferromanganese, which enters so heavily into the production of steel, the present ad valorem duty on that article being 6.52 and the proposed duty 15 per cent, and thereby increase the cost of production in this country.

Now, can the pig-iron trade in the United States stand the reduction proposed in this bill and still maintain the present laborers' wages? That is an all-important question.

This brings us, Mr. President, immediately into the investigation of the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a comparison of laborers' wages, and I have to rely again upon the testimony that was taken before the committee. Mr. Butler, of Youngstown, Ohio, representing the Briar Hill Steel Co. and others, shows that the Department of Commerce and Labor has determined the average of cost of pig iron in the United States to be $14 per ton.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota, first, whether he is serious with himself and the country when he calls the hearings before the Finance Committee "testimony"?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know of any other name that I could give to the hearings. Men were called and examined and gave their testimony and were cross-examined.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose the Senator from North Dakota will bear me out in the assertion that perhaps the indefinite word "hearings" is much more precisely adapted to the self-interested utterances of volunteer witnesses than the word "testimony." "Testimony" generally means that men are sworn to tell the truth. A great many people in the United States seem to think that the so-called witnesses before the Finance Committee were sworn to tell the truth; but, leaving that out for the moment——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me answer that first. "Testimony" in its general sense means the evidence upon which any fact is established, no matter how it comes. Testimony in court is a different proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Testimony may mean the evidence upon which any fact is established, but surely the Senator from North Dakota will not contend that the utterances of volunteer, self-summoned, interested witnesses constitutes "evidence" of any description. I merely want to make the point, that the country may understand that these witnesses were not regularly summoned and regularly sworn. They were men who came here voluntarily to make an argument—a speech—before the Finance Committee in favor of the increase or maintenance of their share of time—profits.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator really believe that if a single one of those witnesses had been under oath his testimony would have been different from what it was?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not answer that question, because I can not say beforehand whether a man who will tell a falsehood without being under oath would be willing to tell it under oath; but I can point to several instances which I think both the Senator himself and I would regard as "exaggerations," to express it in the most charitable way.

Now, the question I want to ask the Senator, after leading up by that, is this: Where does the duty upon ferromanganese, if it is levied in this bill, go?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is asking me a question which his own inquiry answers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought I understood the Senator to say that with the exception of one company nobody made ferromanganese in the United States. Does he mean by that that nobody could make ferromanganese except that company?

Mr. McCUMBER. I mean to say just what I said, that only one company in the United States manufactures it, and according to the testimony no other company in the United States could afford to manufacture it. Therefore, if one company is so constituted that it can afford to manufacture it and no other company can afford to manufacture it, I assume that those conditions will continue for a time at least.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will follow that question with another. I suppose there is no delicacy about mentioning the name of the company which alone can make ferromanganese.

Mr. McCUMBER. I mentioned it in my argument.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not hear it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the so-called Steel Trust.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it is so called. And it may be properly so called.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Steel Trust?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from North Dakota know whether a man by the name of Perkins has anything to do with that company?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not care whether he has an interest or not, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to identify the company or association. Generally we do not know them by name down in the farming community and we get them connected with certain individuals.

Mr. McCUMBER. If he did own it that would scarcely be any reason why this bill should raise the duty and add to his income. It might possibly influence me a trifle in lowering it rather than raising it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see the Senator from North Dakota is gradually coming to the Democratic viewpoint in connection with the tariff. I understand now he only would be willing then to have his vote influenced upon the tariff by its effect upon a trust. Am I correct in that?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; the Senator is not correct; but he can go ahead and make his argument upon any assumption that will please him, and then I will answer it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon, I hoped I was correct about that. The Senator had put it so strongly that I was emboldened to ask the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can answer it in a nutshell if the Senator wants the answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. For myself I will frankly confess if the Senator will show me where any tariff duty helps a trust I will reduce it or do away with it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am a little afraid the Senator would reduce it, whether it would help the trust or whether it would not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is some sense in that, too, because if I thought it would benefit the consumers—the American people—I would vote to reduce it; and if, in reducing it, it would hurt the trust, that would reenforce me in my determination.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator very candidly.

First. I would not vote for any measure that would destroy the great number of small industries all over the country because a single one could manufacture so cheaply that it would earn more than what we might consider a fair compensation upon its investment. Second. I would not destroy the interests of the country for the purpose of getting cheap products when I would know that a man had better pay a good price for an article and have the money to buy that article than to have a cheap article and no money to pay for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I recognize that the Senator is upon the old familiar ground. It is the old ground that "a cheap coat spells a cheap man."

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it is upon the old ground that the man who is compelled to go to the soup houses for something to eat is not going to buy goods at any price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a self-evident proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wanted to give the testimony of Mr. Butler. It may be that the Senator from Iowa would challenge the conclusions of Mr. Butler in his testimony as to the cost of production at home and abroad, but I am taking the testimony as it appeared before the committee and I am placing that portion of it upon the record which pertains to this particular question.

Mr. Butler, of Youngstown, Ohio, representing the Briar Hill Steel Co. and others, shows that the Department of Commerce and Labor have determined the average cost of pig iron in the United States to be about $14 per ton. He draws from the same source of information as the Senator from Iowa, but he adds that this figure is based on the cost as derived from the books of companies where plants are more economically situation than those of smaller companies. The cost of the latter companies, he asserts, would be over $15 per ton.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota one more question.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right, the Senator may ask it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from North Dakota think we ought to have protection high enough to protect ill-equipped and ill-administered industries? I understood him a moment ago to say that this so-called witness confessed or said—the Senator, I know, used the word "showed," which seemed to me a little inaccurate—this so-called witness asserted that while this duty would protect certain well-equipped, well-administered industries there were other industries not well equipped and not well administered it would not protect.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the Senator misunderstood the testimony which I quoted, and it would make quite a little difference undoubtedly in the conclusion; but let the Senator go ahead.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator quote it again, so that I may catch it accurately?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will quote it. He adds that this figure is based on the cost as derived from books of companies where plants are more economically situated than those of smaller companies. There is quite a little difference, the Senator will observe, between one not being economically situated and one that has not the proper facilities for economic manufacture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no doubt about that. Now, I will change my question to suit the testimony which I have just heard. Does the Senator from North Dakota contend that we ought to adapt our tariff duties to suit "ill-situated" factories, factories situated in parts of the country not well adapted to the production of the product?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has not been here all the time I have been speaking on this subject or he would have already had the answer to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that, but I heard what the Senator just quoted from the witness Butler, and he quoted it with approval.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator from Mississippi did not hear the Senator from North Dakota say a short time ago that, of course, he would stand for no rate and believed in no rate that should be sufficient to protect, for instance, the Pacific coast manufacturer, with inland cost of transportation, as against a foreign country, with very much cheaper water transportation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not talking now about a low rate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I fully comprehend the Senator's question, and I will answer it in full.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am asking the Senator this question——

Mr. McCUMBER. I heard the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator contend that the ill-situated factories in the United States ought to be protected at the cost of the American consumer in order that they may continue to exist at a profit to themselves in business, although ill situated?

Mr. McCUMBER. Is the Senator ready for my answer?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. My answer is, Mr. President, as I stated before, that I do not approve a tariff policy that will maintain a very small percentage of manufacturers who can produce only at a high cost; but, on the other hand, I will not select a single concern in the United States that can produce, because of its situation and capital and otherwise, more cheaply than all of the others, and make its cost of production the standard for duties, and thereby discriminate against all other manufacturers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, one more question.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I did that I simply would destroy all of the others and I would create a monopoly of the one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose, in connection with the factories in a given industry, you ascertain that a majority of them are ill situated, would you vote to maintain that majority of that particular industry in control of the American market at the expense of the American consumer?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not if they were ill situated according to my view, but the Senator's view and mine might differ very radically. The Senator might hold that they were ill situated, for instance, in the steel industry if they were not as well situated as the Steel Trust——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask the Senator to answer the question according to my view but according to his. If, according to the Senator's view, a majority of the people engaged in the particular industry were ill situated, would he maintain them in business by the taxing power of the United States at the expense of the American consumer?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; and no one else would. I have enough confidence, and I think the Senator has, in the average intelligence of American manufacturers to believe that they will not, as a rule, establish their concerns in an ill-situated place, but they will be established as near as possible to the centers of trade, and as near as practicable to raw material used, to get the very best results.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator as quoting the so-called testimony of a so-called witness to the effect that a given duty might be sufficient for a few well-situated factories, but would not be sufficient for the other factories engaged in that business in the United States. If I correctly understood the Senator, he was quoting the language of a witness who had made the assertion of a fact the Senator has just assented could not be possible, to wit, that a majority of the manufacturers engaged in a given business would be ill situated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr President. Because one manufacturer is very favorably situated it does not mean that all other manufacturers who are not so favorably situated are ill situated. The company that has its iron ore and its coal and its lime and everything else that they may need at its very doors is certainly better situated than the company which has to import its ores or the company which has to haul its coal or ore a great distance. Yet I would not put out of business the other company because it was not as well situated nor would I believe in any character of a tariff rate that would take only one, two, or three, or whatever might be the number, of those who are most favorably situated for economical production and base my tariff rates upon the cost of their production.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I may possibly have misunderstood what the Senator said or rather what he quoted, but if I caught it aright I did not hear that the so-called witness Butler in his so-called testimony said one word about one industry. If I heard it aright he said some of these industries, and contrasted them with a great many more.

Of course, I see the drift of the Senator's remarks. He is trying to fasten this entire discussion upon the Steel Trust, a trust which by the way has been fed very largely by the theories of taxation to which the Senator is addicted and would have been starved to death long ago if my theories could have prevailed.

I am trying to bring it down to the so-called testimony of the so-called witness Butler just as the Senator quoted it. I would be glad if the Senator would not leave the so-called testimony of the so-called witness Butler to go back to the Steel Trust every time we talk of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator also mean the so-called Steel Trust?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it is the real trust this time, not so-called at all. It has immense influences, and it has behind it the reenforced power of a distinguished ex-President of the United States, and its evil workings have been materially avoided under the incumbency of the present President of the United States.

I have never discovered so far that the gentlemen of the school of politics to which the Senator from North Dakota belongs have ever attempted to interfere with the Steel Trust to any particular extent, or if they have the Steel Trust has not found it out, or if the Steel Trust in its inner arcanum has found it, Gary and Perkins have not.

I was asking about the so-called testimony of the so-called witness Butler in connection with the real question that we were discussing a moment ago. If I understood what the Senator quoted from Mr. Butler, he said that this duty might be sufficient for a few of these industries, but it would be utterly insufficient for a majority of them. If he said that and then contradistinguished the two from one another by saying that some of them were ill situated and some were well situated, he made the assertion which the Senator from North Dakota says is an absurdity, to wit, that a majority of the manufacturers engaged in a given industry could have selected ill-situated localities and environments or surroundings.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right, Mr. President; if the Senator has construed the words "not as well situated" to be "ill situated," of course he can base any character of argument upon that proposition he chooses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if somebody were to come in and say that I was not as well furnished with personal pulchritude as the Senator from North Dakota, which they might very well say, of course they would mean that in comparison with the Senator from North Dakota I was ill situated with regard to personal pulchritude. I can not see any difference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not care about the discussion of the so-called trust and the so-called testimony of a so-called witness or what a so-called Republican President has done or failed to do or what a so-called Democratic President by the name of Cleveland also failed to do or what he did do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. I scarcely think it is appropriate to the discussion at hand. I did not observe that either the Democratic Party or the President of that party was very vigorous in its attempt to destroy the trusts, which were already well under way while that party had control of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. But I must admit, Mr. President, that the subject is rather remote from the one under discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one moment. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not put me before the country in the attitude of referring to the ex-President as the so-called ex-President or the present President as the so-called President. They are both in very real presence before the American people to-day, accusing one another of all sorts of things, and not only doing that but proving many of their respective assertions, too. They are actual realities; they are not so called, and I was not terming either one of them so called. They are genuine evils.

Mr. CUMMINS. If not disagreeable to the Senator from North Dakota to return to the subject, I want to remind him that Mr. Butler was in error when he said that the report of the Commissioner of Corporations was based upon a small production of pig iron or upon the production of a large company. The table that I used the other day——

Mr. McCUMBER. He did not say either. I will repeat Mr. Butler's testimony if the Senator wishes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I would be glad to have that done.

Mr. McCUMBER. After referring to the $14, he says that this figure is based on the cost as derived from books of companies where plants are more economically situated than those of smaller companies. The cost of the latter companies would be over $15 per ton in the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. The cost to which I have referred, and to which I did pay some attention the other day, is a cost derived from an examination of the production of 66,000,000 tons of pig iron during the four years from 1902 to 1906. Will the Senator from North Dakota state how much pig iron was produced in the United States in those four years?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not the figures. I have the figures of our production for the year 1911, if the Senator wishes that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; if the Senator has not the figures at hand. I think he will find this table covers from 80 to 90 per cent of the entire production of those years.

Mr. McCUMBER. For the year 1911 they are all quoted—pig iron, ferromanganese, ferrosilicon, in one bracket—and they are quoted, I notice, at 27,303,567 tons.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the first place, the production has almost doubled since that time; at least it has been one-third. The 66,000,000 tons under consideration by Mr. Smith, Commissioner of Corporations, as I remember it, will be found to be 90 per cent or more of all the pig iron produced in the United States during the period of examination. So his conclusions must be about fair.

It will not do to say that there were some very small companies not included within his examinations which would increase the general cost. More than that, Mr. Butler only pays attention in his evidence—and I am perfectly willing to call it evidence—to the highest cost, and therefore the highest-priced pig iron. He does not mention that there is a very great quantity of pig iron produced in this country for less than $9 per ton.

Mr. McCUMBER. I presume he is talking of that pig iron from which the steel rails, and so forth, are made. He says the cost to the latter companies would be over $15 per ton. The difference is not so wonderfully great between $14 and about $15 per ton. I would not feel like discriminating against a great number of manufacturers who can come within a dollar a ton on a basis of $14 and $15 of some other company, especially when I consider it in the light of other evidence as to the cost of the same article in foreign countries.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would the Senator from North Dakota, if he found that 90 per cent of the pig iron produced in our country cost $14 a ton, assess a duty to protect, if you please, or preserve the 10 per cent the production of which might cost $15 per ton?

Mr. McCUMBER. Scarcely.

Mr. CUMMINS. The answer is just what I would have expected from the Senator from North Dakota. It is a frank, candid answer.

Mr. McCUMBER. This $15 per ton is based upon the testimony of this witness as to the cost of production in the eastern division. If we take this eastern division at $15 per ton, and the foreign cost approximately at $10 per ton, there would be a difference of $5 per ton in favor of the foreigner. Now, compare this cost with the Cleveland district in England, of $9.48 per ton, and the Luxemburg-Loraine district in Germany, at $8.71 per ton. If, therefore, the wholesale prices correspond with the comparative cost of production in the two countries, it would require a 50 per cent ad valorem duty to balance the difference in the cost of the production.

I am willing to make all proper allowances. I will assume that it costs considerably more in foreign countries than is given in the figures that are printed here—$9.48 or $8.71 in England and in Germany, respectively. But we have the further testimony that, at least, they can convert pig iron into rails and can produce those rails for from $18 to $19 per ton.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the Senator from North Dakota wants to be accurate. He speaks of the Cleveland pig iron, produced in the Cleveland district in England. Now, in the same district there is produced a pig iron known as hematite, which is the same kind of pig iron that is produced in this country at $14 per ton.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Cleveland pig iron is produced at about $9 abroad, which is parallel to our southern or foundry pig iron in this country.

Mr. McCUMBER. And which the Senator contends is not ordinarily made into rails.

Mr. CUMMINS. That kind of pig iron is not ordinarily, and it could never, without great expense, be converted into steel rails.

Mr. McCUMBER. How about the Luxemburg pig iron? I understand that is converted into rails?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is in the Luxemburg district a quality of pig iron manufactured which is fit to be manufactured into steel rails.

Mr. McCUMBER. And it is a quality that costs in its production only about $8.71 a ton.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not agree to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Our general disagreements, as I observed before, are on questions of evidence rather than of policy.

Now, I want to give the testimony of Mr. Peckitt, representing the Empire Steel & Iron Co. He says that "No. 3 Middlesboro pig to-day is selling at 49 shillings cash, or approximately $14.72 f. o. b. either Philadelphia or New York."

That means the cost of production in England, plus the profit of the producer and plus the freight and plus the tariff, and with all those it is laid down at these points at $14.72 per ton. If you deduct the tariff of $2.50 per ton, freight $1.50, you would have the selling price in England at about $10 per ton, while it is admitted that our production cost is over $14 per ton.

Mr. Butler further says that ocean freight on pig iron is very variable. There are frequently times when pig iron is welcomed at merely ballast rates. Ocean freights seldom exceed $1.60 per ton. Freight rates from foreign works to port hardly exceed 90 cents per ton.

Those freight rates cover, we will say, $2.50 difference in cost, leaving at least $2.50 which should be covered by a protective duty. That is the duty under the Payne-Aldrich bill. The duty under the proposed bill would be probably less than $1 per ton. Even the present rates do not measure ordinarily the actual difference in the cost of producing and placing pig iron at the points of consumption in the United States. We are able to hold our trade under present duties, even laboring under this disadvantage, because of the close proximity of our productive to our consuming centers and our ability to anticipate before the foreigner can the demand in any section and the shorter period required by us to make delivery.

Under our present rates of duty, of course, it is impossible for us to compete with the foreigner in pig iron on the Pacific coast. Mr. Schwab testified that he buys pig iron in China for Pacific coast use; that he can not use pig iron manufactured East on account of the freight rates across the continent; that to ship across to the Pacific coast costs from $8 to $9 per ton; that Germany crosses the ocean with her product as cheaply as we can ship 100 miles by rail; that it costs us about as much in freight to put pig iron or steel into New York as it costs Belgium in freight to put these articles into the same city; that we must use American bottoms for carrying freight from ocean to ocean, and we are laboring under a disadvantage of nearly double in freight by water what it costs the foreigner by water; that we can not compete with Germany in Argentina or in Brazil even if we sell at cost; and that Germany gets especially low rates on railroads and canals in all cases of exports. Then, speaking of the expense of manufacturing pig-iron billets, Mr. Schwab says that pig iron from Hankow, China, can be made for $7.50 a ton, and they make pig iron in Luxemburg for $8.50 and $9 per ton. This, Mr. President, is the particular character of pig iron which he says can be and is being converted into steel.

The cost of manufacturing pig iron in seven districts in the United States and in Germany and in England is shown by the evidence in the following table on this subject, and I ask that it be inserted as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Condensed cost of manufacturing pig iron in the seven districts of the United States and in Germany and England.

Eastern Pennsylvania	$18.79
Buffalo	16.45
Southern Ohio	16.44
Mahoning and Shenango Valleys	16.50
Middle West	16.10
Virginia	14.27
Alabama and Tennessee	12.00
Germany	9.42
England	9.48

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that is the testimony that is given before the Committee on Finance and the evidence upon which we must base our findings.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. How does the Senator from North Dakota reconcile the statements of Mr. Schwab with the fact that the importations of pig iron during the year 1911 were made upon a foreign value of $16 a ton?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not see that that in any way conflicts with the conclusion as given by the witness.

Mr. CUMMINS. He says the cost of pig iron in Germany is $8 a ton, practically, and in England $9 a ton. We imported a little pig iron in the last year, including some from China, but the average foreign value—that is, the price that we paid for this pig iron abroad during the last year—was $15.97 per ton.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, there are many reasons why during the last year, and possibly for the last two years, there has been very little pig iron imported into the United States and very little of the ordinary heavy steel. There is a great demand in both Germany and in England for those steel products. The little that they have sent over here I assume they have got very good prices for, and so much better prices that it justified them in shipping it over here rather than receiving the remuneration that they received under a good home demand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am advised that there never was a year in which either Germany or England exported more iron and steel than last year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The prices of pig iron in England during the last year have not been substantially above the average prices for five years.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when I spoke of the home demand, of course I meant the demand for exportation from home. Everyone knows that at least 70, 80, or 90 per cent, probably, of the pig iron manufactured in both Germany and England is necessarily exported, but it is because of the demand at the exporting centers that they are able to receive good prices, and it is that which has enhanced the value of their product.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to be misunderstood. The exports have not been so large in pig iron as in the finished product. It is not the policy of either Germany or of England to export their raw materials. Both try to manufacture those materials into finished products and to then export them.

Mr. McCUMBER. It pays them better to manufacture them into finished products than to export the raw material.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the Senator only for a minute. The Senator has referred to the testimony of Mr. Butler. I think it is apparent from his testimony why Mr. Butler placed the cost of producing pig iron in the United States at the highest level—very much above the average when you take the average of the eastern Pennsylvania plants or the average of the southern plants; he placed it $4 higher than the average in the Birmingham district, but I do not complain of that so much as I do of the figures that he gives as representing the foreign cost. I have not been able to find in any publication any statement that corroborates his statement with reference to the cost of iron either in England or in Germany. It is true, as he says, that the cost of pig iron in the Cleveland district, where it is lower than anywhere else and everywhere else in Europe, I believe, is the figure that he gives; but Mr. Pepper in his report averaging the cost in Europe—and I assume that Mr. Butler was attempting to average the cost in the United States—averaging the cost of pig iron in England, puts the average cost in the Cleveland district at $9.92 and in the hematite district at $13.45; and averaging the cost in Germany, he puts the cost at Dortmund at from $13.57 to $14.28. Mr. Butler quotes the Luxemburg price, and I believe he gives it at $8.71, while Mr. Pepper, giving the average in the Luxemburg district, gives it at from $12.38 to $12.61.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true. I am not denying that our competition must be with the lower priced article.

I now pass to paragraph 2, slabs, blooms, bar iron, muck bars, and so forth. The present ad valorem duty on those articles runs from 15.45 per cent to 26.37 per cent, while the proposed duty is 10 per cent, less than half of the present duty. We imported last year into the United States of these articles, in pounds, 70,720,941, of the value of $1,351,953. We collected duties thereon of $251,953. Those heavy importations show that there was a fair competition when we had a rate ranging from 15½ to 26½ per cent. To reduce these duties over 50 per cent is certainly a startling proposition and may well cause consternation. Let us take the testimony of Mr. Pigott, of Seattle, Wash. He says:

> Bar iron, up to the present time, for a period of several years has cost us $30 a ton to manufacture. The labor would be about $7.50 a ton. It costs in labor in the foreign country about $3 per ton, and the difference is about $4 per ton in labor alone.

Mr. Pigott also says that under present conditions Germany takes one-half of the American trade in San Francisco in bar iron, and that if the tariff were reduced to 10 per cent ad valorem it would be impossible for them to operate their mills.

Mr. President, of course it is very easy to deny these propositions and to say, "Oh, we think you could continue." The direct testimony of those who testified as experts shows that they could not continue in business with this reduction.

Following the evidence further, we have the testimony of Mr. William M. Measey, of Philadelphia. He said:

> The last reduction in the duty on this product has served to prevent the company in which I am interested from making any proper return on the investment; any further reduction would make it impossible to continue business. It would not bring about a failure of the company, because its financial position is strong, but it would serve to entirely destroy the value of property representing a large investment, which it would be necessary to abandon, and which would thereby be rendered practically worthless.

In the light of this testimony I must hesitate before agreeing to such a great reduction, a reduction which I fear is an abandonment of the protective policy of the Republican Party.

This testimony, Mr. President, stands uncontradicted, at least in the testimony before the Committee on Finance. Mr. Pigott, speaking of the Pacific coast trade, says:

> I have been in the business 10 years and never got a dollar out of it. We have a hard struggle there, and we need the protection that other institutions have secured to enable them to build up their industries; and if this duty is reduced to 10 per cent ad valorem, we can not, under the conditions on the Pacific coast, manufacture steel as cheaply as the foreigner can lay it down at our doors and our mills at a profit. That is all there is to it.

All of this evidence raises a danger signal demanding the attention of every prudent legislator.

Taking the next paragraph, beams, girders, and other structural iron, the present duty amounts to 30.56 per cent, while the proposed ad valorem duty is 15 per cent. Everywhere in the bill there seems to be a desire simply to cut the duty in the middle without any investigation. That, in my opinion, is equivalent to turning the entire western trade in those particular articles over to Germany. The Germans secured half of it already.

Paragraph 7, railway bars and T rails. The present duty is 15.34 per cent, not a heavy duty, while the proposed ad valorem duty is 10 per cent. Our imports in that particular line are, of course, negligible. Mr. Schwab says, concerning this paragraph:

I testified before the Ways and Means Committee, and I see no reason to change my estimate, that it cost to produce a ton of steel rails from $22 to $23 per ton, and that it costs in Germany from $18 to $19 per ton.

The 15½ per cent is not, I repeat, an excessive duty, and lowering it one-third—reducing it to 10 per cent—may under certain conditions disastrously affect our manufacture of these products. He further says:

The cheapest pig iron made in Germany is made at Luxemburg. They make pig iron there at, I know, $8.50 and $9 a ton, and I know that can be converted into rails at $10 more. That is the way I arrive at what the cost is there.

If the wholesale prices correspond with the cost of manufacture, it would require over 20 per cent ad valorem duty to equalize the cost in Germany with the cost in the United States. That is more than the present duty; but I believe that we sell closer here than the Germans do, and the fact that we are near to our field of consumption would enable us to sell in the face of German competition even if the difference in the cost of production was not exactly equalized by the tariff rate.

If we are able to compete upon the basis of these estimates of cost of production, it is because of our proximity to the field of consumption and our acquaintance with the markets and demands.

We exported during the year ending June 30, 1911, of these materials $11,377,444.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. In a moment; when I finish this paragraph.

The wholesale market value per unit at the port of exportation in the United States was $29.07. That was probably lower than the average selling price in the United States. The wholesale market value per unit in the principal markets of the Old World at point of exportation, $25.56.

So, whether we take the wholesale prices or whether we take the cost of production, 20 per cent will not measure the full difference, and yet we propose to cut the duty down to 10 per cent.

I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator a little while ago, in discussing the importations of bar iron upon the Pacific coast, to read from the testimony of Mr. Pigott.

Mr. McCUMBER. I read from the testimony of Mr. Pigott some time ago.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not able to find it immediately, but I have found it now, and if the Senator has no objection I should like to read from Mr. Pigott's testimony with regard to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator does not wish to read it all, does he?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. How long is the excerpt which the Senator wishes to introduce?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a little less than a page of the hearing, but I will not encumber the Senator's speech if he objects.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it will be just as satisfactory to the Senator, I wish he would put it in at the end. I have many tables here, and I want to get through this afternoon.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will put it in, with the permission of the Senator; but I will state briefly, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The substance of that part of Mr. Pigott's testimony to which I desire to call attention. Mr. Pigott spoke about the disadvantages that we are under on the Pacific coast with reference to bar iron as against Belgium and certain other European countries. He fixed the average freight on bar iron to the Pacific coast at $5 a ton. He also said that the entire labor cost of producing this iron was $7.50; that it cost about twice as much here as it did abroad, making the difference in labor cost here and abroad a little over $3, as he testified. Then he was asked the question if he did not say that the average freight was $5 and the difference in labor cost was $3.50, so that the net result would be an advantage in favor of the American producer of about $1 or $1.50 a ton, and he answered that that was true.

Mr. McCUMBER. There was some controversy, as I recall—I was present when that testimony was taken—as to its meaning, but I do not desire to go into that at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. With the permission of the Senator, I will put in the RECORD the testimony to which I have referred.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senator SIMMONS. What is the labor cost of producing bar iron on the Pacific coast?

Mr. PIGOTT. The common labor, Senator, is, I would judge, about 10 to 15 per cent higher than it is in the East here. But the skilled labor is practically the same. We pay the same wages.

Senator SIMMONS. What I want to get at, for the benefit of the committee, is the total labor cost of producing a ton of bar iron on the Pacific coast, where your factory is. What does it cost you?

Mr. PIGOTT. We figure at the present time that our labor cost enters into the production of a ton of bar steel to the extent of about 25 per cent.

Senator SIMMONS. How much is that in dollars and cents?

Mr. PIGOTT. Bar iron, up to the present time, for a period of several years has cost us $30 a ton to manufacture. The labor would be about $7.50 a ton.

Senator SIMMONS. What is the difference, in your judgment, in the labor cost of producing a ton of that material in the countries that compete with you? It costs you seven dollars and some cents here; what does it cost there, to the best of your information?

Mr. PIGOTT. About one-half.

Senator SIMMONS. Then it costs about $3 there?

Mr. PIGOTT. About $4.

Senator SIMMONS. Then the difference is about $4?

Mr. PIGOTT. Yes, sir.

Senator SIMMONS. And you say the freight to the Pacific coast is $5?

Mr. PIGOTT. Yes.

Senator SIMMONS. Then you would have a dollar advantage on the freight alone?

Mr. PIGOTT. I did not quite catch that.

Senator SIMMONS. You said the labor cost here was something over $7, and in Europe it was about half that amount. You estimated a difference of about $4; it costs about $4 more here than there. Now, I understood you to say a little while ago that the average freight rate was about $5 a ton.

Mr. PIGOTT. Yes, sir.

Senator SIMMONS. So that you have an advantage of a dollar a ton, offsetting the difference of the labor cost by the difference in freight.

Mr. PIGOTT. The average freight rate by steamer is $5 a ton, when you ship by steamer.

Senator SIMMONS. But a little while ago you said some came in by sailing vessels at $2.50, and some came in steamers, costing about $6, or something like that; and then I asked you to average it, and you said the average would be about $5.

Mr. PIGOTT. That is as far as the protection would be on freight and labor. I should think that would be about correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. Schwab further states that the ocean freight from Germany in foreign bottoms is as low as our freight 100 miles inland to get down to the coast.

He also says that Germany ships to America for from $1.75 to $2 a ton. We pay, from Bethlehem to New York, 90 miles, $1.50 per ton.

Speaking of the disastrous results of this proposed reduction, Mr. Schwab says:

My point is this: My interest in the Bethlehem Steel Co. is not essential or necessary to me personally. I have no heirs and I have no children to whom to leave it. My chief desire and chief pleasure in life has been to take this industry and build it into a great and successful thing—a great successful works. I have not taken a penny out of it. But I do not mind saying—and saying with all the earnestness I know how—that if this bill passes I shall drop it and any further interest in it. It is not possible to make it successful.

Senators can take that for exactly what it is worth.

I now come to anvils, which are covered by paragraph 17.

The present ad valorem duty is 31.95 per cent, while the proposed ad valorem duty is 15 per cent.

Mr. Vorhees, representing Columbus Forge & Iron Co., says that under the Dingley law imported anvils were laid down at our seaports in the United States at from one-half to three-fourths cent per pound less than American manufacturers can sell, allowing fair profit to manufacture. Under the Payne-Aldrich bill, imported anvils came into our seaports at about 1 cent less per pound than American manufacturers could produce wrought anvils at a fair profit. Freight on Swedish cast-steel anvils from Stockholm to New Orleans, 30 cents per hundred pounds; from New York to New Orleans, 40 cents per hundred pounds.

It costs more in freight from New York to New Orleans than it does from Sweden to New Orleans, and yet in spite of their cheaper production we are not only to be deprived of the present protection duty of nearly 32 per cent, but that is to be reduced to 15 per cent, which affords no adequate protection. In my opinion it will be equivalent to turning over the trade to the foreign countries, provided there is a fair degree of certainty that it will be left in that condition long enough for the foreign countries to manufacture to supply the demand.

Paragraph 24 covers chains. The present ad valorem duty ranges from 22.39 to 53.38 per cent. The proposed duty is 20 per cent. We imported last year 1,146,598 pounds of the value of $70,542.

Mr. Woodhouse, representing Woodhouse Chain Works, submits a table showing foreign selling price and American cost price of chains. Now, mark you, this is the foreign selling price, not the foreign production cost, and our production cost, because we are unable to get the figures showing the cost of production to the foreign producer. After making proper allowance for profit it is probable that the foreign cost compared with American cost would be as 5 to 7. It would therefore require a duty of about 40 per cent to equal the difference in cost, whereas the proposed duty is but 20 per cent, or one-half of that requirement.

I ask leave to insert at this point a table bearing on this matter. I want first, however, to call attention to a few of the items. In the case of chain 2 inches and larger per hundred pounds the average foreign selling price is $2.80, while the American production cost is $3.66; on chain less than 2 inches, but not less than thirteen-sixteenths of an inch, the foreign selling price is $3, while the average American production cost is $4.20.

On chain less than thirteen-sixteenths of an inch the foreign selling price is $4.17, while the American production cost is $7.25. I have followed that out far enough to show clearly that 20 per cent will not equal the difference in the cost of production in this country and abroad. I now ask permission that the table may be inserted as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

CHAINS—IRON OR STEEL.

The following tables are made up by comparing the average of actual English or foreign selling prices f. o. b. Liverpool as compared with the actual average cost of American manufacturers delivered to New York City in both instances. American costs given do not, however, include any profit whatever. American costs compared with foreign selling prices are in each case figured on the same sizes in each group and are, as the Ways and Means Committee requested, selling prices ruling on English chain during 1907, and the American costs are the costs for 1907:

Size chain (per 112 pounds).	Per 100 pounds f. o. b. Liverpool.	Per 100 pounds New York.
		Average foreign selling price f. o. b.	Average American cost.
2 inches and larger	13/-	$2.80
Freight, insurance, and wharfage		.18
Proposed duty, ⅜ cent per pound or 30 per cent ad valorem		.87½
		3.85½	$3.66
Less than 2 inches but not less than ⅞ inch	14/-	3.00
Freight, insurance, and wharfage		.20
Proposed duty, 1 cent per pound or 40 per cent ad valorem		1.20
		4.40	4.20
Less than ⅞ inch but not less than ¾ inch	19/5½	4.17
Freight, insurance, and wharfage		.20
Proposed duty, 1¼ cents per pound or 60 per cent ad valorem		2.50
		6.87	7.25
Less than ¾ inch but not less than ⅝ inch	30/4	6.50
Freight, insurance, and wharfage		.22
Proposed duty, 2 cents per pound or 60 per cent ad valorem		3.90
		10.62	11.55

Size chain (per 100 pounds).	Per 100 pounds f. o. b. foreign point of shipment at seaboard.	Foreign selling price per 100 pounds.	American cost per 100 pounds
Less than ½ inch chain of any description containing not more than 12 links per foot	$3.48
Freight, insurance, and wharfage	.18	$6.66	$7.32
Proposed duty 3 cents	3.00
Average weight per 100 feet, 23 pounds	6.00
Sizes 2/0 to No. 2, freight, insurance, and wharfage	.25	9.85	10.60
Proposed duty 3 cents per pound or 60 per cent ad valorem	3.60
Less than ½ inch chain of any description containing more than 12 links per foot:
Average weight per 100 feet, sizes 2/0 to No. 2, 28 pounds	11.00
Freight, insurance, and wharfage	.25	21.15	23.50
Proposed duty 5 cents per pound or 90 per cent ad valorem	9.90

Mr. McCUMBER. The Lefever Arms Co., of Syracuse, N. Y., say that anything less than 50 per cent ad valorem on chains means the failure and abandonment of bicycle and automatic-chain industry in the United States. This is a very important portion of the chain-making industry.

Eli Atwood, representing Lebanon Chain Works, says that if this duty is taken off it will be impossible for them to live under present conditions. And yet, without any investigation of its effect, the House has cut the duty one-half.

The next important paragraph is No. 26: Cutlery, and so forth. The present ad valorem duty is 65.70 per cent; the proposed duty is 35 per cent, or about one-half the present rate. The value of imports is $1,923,823, and the duty collected, $1,263,974.

We not only now propose by this reduction to surrender a large portion of that income, but necessarily either to reduce the wages of American labor or else close the American shops.

What is the comparative cost of production of cutlery in this and foreign countries?

Mr. Dickinson, representing Beckton, Dickinson & Co., estimates that cutlery costing $8.80 to manufacture in America would cost $4.40 in Germany.

Dwight, Devine & Co. gives a table of cost of production and selling prices of American and German pocketknives.

I will call attention to a few of the items, and then ask that the entire table be printed as part of my remarks. These figures represent foreign values and American cost of pocketknives. On grade No. 2 the producing cost of the American patterns is $3.10, while the foreign value of similar German patterns is $1.25. In the case of No. 7, the American cost is $5.30, while the German selling price is $1.25, and so on.

I now ask to insert the table in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Exhibit American and German pocketknives.

COST AND SELLING PRICES.

Mr. McCUMBER. From this table it will be observed that a class of knives costing $5.79 in the United States will cost in Germany $1.83; that the single knife, averaging 48 cents in the United States, will cost in Germany 15 cents; and yet this bill seeks to cut the duty from 65 per cent to 35 per cent, although 65 per cent does not measure the actual difference between the selling price in Germany and the cost of production in the United States. And it purposes to either maintain the same amount of income from duties on cutlery by increasing the importations, and thereby decreasing the American production and American earnings, or reduce our income from this source.

In the manufacture of razors Max Schaschepen, representing Robeson Cutlery Co., referring to wages says: "An expert razor man might make here $4 a day and there from $1 to $1.50."

A petition furnished by the cutlery companies of Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania gives the following table of wages in the United States and Germany:

	Weekly wages paid in Germany.	Weekly wages paid in the United States.
Forgers	$4.30-$7.00	$15.00-$21.00

Mr. Curtis, of Meriden, Conn., manufacturing table cutlery, gives the American and German wages as follows:

The average wage paid in this country is from $18 to $21 a week for what we call cutlers, men who understand the business, intelligent men; and in Germany, as near as I can learn, it is from $9 to $12, not over $12.

The cost of production is shown in the following table:

NOTE.—It will be seen by the above on razor No. 1 (of which there were imported during the year ending June 30, 1911, 109,329 dozen) that it is impossible for the American manufacturer to even make any effort to secure business under this classification.

It will be observed by this table that razors of class No. 3 cost the German $1.99 per dozen, the American $3.75 per dozen.

Class No. 4 costs the German $2.99 per dozen, the American $4.84 per dozen.

Class No. 5 costs the German $3.28 per dozen, the American $6.02 per dozen.

The American cost is nearly double the German cost, and yet, having now only 65 per cent, this bill proposes a cut to 35 per cent.

Speaking of the disastrous results, Mr. Rockwell, representing the Miller Bros. Cutlery Co., says that if the rate is reduced to 35 per cent, the result upon their business would be to practically wipe it out.

Maybe all of these witnesses are simply so-called witnesses and their testimony is only so-called testimony, but I believe that this so-called testimony is as near accurate as we are liable to secure, and I further believe that if we reduce the duty to less than one-third the actual difference in the cost of production at home and abroad it must necessarily work disaster to the American manufacturer.

The next paragraph which I shall consider relates to machine tools.

Mr. Grier, representing 225 machine-tool manufacturers, says that the percentage of material in a machine tool is equal to 27.2, leaving the cost of labor 62.8, and that the articles that enter into their product are protected in the Underwood bill from 10 to 25 per cent, whereas the finished article is put on the free list; that the foreigner would get ball bearings, which are used extensively in machine tools but do not bear a very great per cent in the total cost, 25 per cent cheaper than they could, because the rate of duty in the Underwood bill is 25 per cent. One million dollars worth of those ball bearings are now coming into this country annually.

The average wage paid machine operators in Munich, Saxony, Berlin, and Magdeburg per hour, 15 cents. Our price per hour, average of 67 tool concerns, 27.9 cents.

Mr. Grier submits the following table, furnished him by Alex Luchars, publisher of Machiner. This table was compiled in 1908, since which time, he states, wages in Europe have increased on an average of 10 per cent:

PRINTING PRESSES.

I now take up printing presses.

Mr. Titsworth, of Plainfield, N. J., representing the Potter Printing Press Co., states that placing printing presses on the free list is a serious menace to an industry upon whose product 75 per cent to 80 per cent is expended for labor and 20 to 25 per cent for material. The material used is practically all subject to duty, 75 per cent being pig iron.

So far American manufacturers have not been able to compete with foreign manufacturers in markets of the world. Our Government reports give exports of printing presses from United States, in 1907, as $2,080,837; but it appears that the classification of printing presses in the report includes such other machines as are used in a printing office, as embossing presses, cutting and scoring presses, steel plate presses, bronzing machines, paper feeders, paper cutters, folding machines, gathering machines, printing-press accessories, and so forth. As an example, last year a foreign shipment was made of $15,000, all being classed as printing machinery—$4,000 was for a printing press; the rest was cognate machinery.

The foreign manufacturer now uses our improved tools or duplicates of them and has learned our latest and best methods of manufacture by introducing his men temporarily into our best equipped shops. This has given him all the advantage we possess of tools and methods plus the advantage of very low-priced labor of an average of 14 cents an hour in foreign countries as against our 37 cents.

Mr. Titsworth submits the following table showing comparison of wages paid in this and foreign countries:

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from North Dakota is no doubt aware that a number of manufacturers of presses in the United States who were most prosperous and who, under the protection of American patents and American tariffs, made millions of dollars, have gone abroad and established their manufactories and are now making presses for foreign countries with the cheap labor to which he refers. That is to say, they use the American tariff laws and the American patent laws for the purpose of exacting excessive prices from American newspapers and users of presses, and then they have gone abroad and use the cheap labor there to complete and build up a foreign enterprise in a foreign country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator tell me the name of any American company manufacturing presses abroad?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. R. Hoe & Co.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator could have heard the testimony that was taken before the Finance Committee upon the question of exporting these machines to Germany and other countries. The Americans have taken a very advanced lead over all the nations of the world in getting out new machines, useful machines, in the matter of saving of time and expense. They were able to sell in Germany and in England as long as there was a demand for that character of press, not that they could manufacture it cheaper, but there was a demand for the higher class machine for a higher price. They sold a few of those machines. Then the German manufacturer comes on and imitates that machine, duplicates it, and the American manufacturer can no longer export and sell that character of machine.

In what is known as the stock-trade machines we have never been able to compete with the foreign manufacturers, and with the present progressive spirit in Germany especially I do not believe we will be able to keep very much in advance of them and continue to export machinery of a better class than they manufacture themselves. Those exports were not because we could manufacture certain machines cheaper, but because the foreigners were willing to pay a higher price for an advanced character of machine.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does not the Senator from North Dakota think that we can keep just as far ahead of the rest of the world in the future as we have in the past, and if not, why?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer. I have never been one of those Americans who believe for a single moment that we were intellectually so much superior to all the other nations of the world. I believe it is opportunity that develops the American intellectuality. I believe it is the lack of opportunity that stunts the intellectual growth of some of the nations of the Old World. We have had this vast country to open up. We have had all these vast resources at our very feet. All we had to do was to develop them. With that wonderful opportunity before us for the last hundred years, we have been constantly placed in a position where there was a great demand upon our ability to produce machines, for instance, that would accomplish very much more in energy than could be accomplished by the small character of machines made in the old country or by human labor. I do not believe for one moment that when Hans, leaving Germany, coming over in the steerage, lands upon American soil, his intellectuality has changed to any extent, but that he is the same Dutchman who left the old country, and if he had had the same opportunities in the old country that he has here, I think he would have done exactly as well. It certainly so happens that when he comes to this country he advances just as rapidly as the old American stock.

We have on the great plains of Minnesota and the Dakotas and Nebraska a condition that demands the plow. We might have used the old plow that was used in Germany, and is still used in some Eastern States, but we found a more economic way to break and plow that land. We manufacture a traction engine which will take a dozen plows. If we put the German in close touch with those requirements he will be able to compete with us and he will advance his products just as rapidly as we.

If we so reduce our tariff that we can place the foreigner upon an exactly equal basis with the American in most of these great fields of opportunity, he will be able to meet the demand as well as the American will be able to meet it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator's argument is contradictory with itself. He said a few moments ago that the Germans had copied our machines, and having learned from us how to manufacture them they could manufacture them more cheaply than we can. He now says that the Germans, introduced into this great opportunity, can keep pace with us.

I believe as the Senator from North Dakota has said that progress is the result of opportunity, and without it there can be no progress. But with this field closed to the foreigner by our tariff duties—nevertheless the foreigner has taken our machines and copied them, and, I have no doubt, can produce them more cheaply than we can. But I believe this same opportunity, which the Senator from North Dakota has so eloquently described and depicted, will lead the people who now enjoy it and to whom it is open to advance again, and allow those more or less unfortunate people abroad to again copy what we produce.

I am not willing to believe that the race of progress has fallen. I am not willing to believe we have reached the climax of human endeavor. While I have no sympathy with the bill which puts printing presses on the free list, yet it is nevertheless true that we do not import printing presses, but we do export them, and I am glad we can. But I want to preserve a duty on them in order to maintain the very opportunity that has been suggested by the Senator from North Dakota. But do not let us suppose that we have reached the end of all things, and that inasmuch as the people of other nations may copy what we have done, that, therefore, there is nothing in the future for us except to decay and deteriorate into a miserable and backward country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would wait a moment until I can answer the Senator from Iowa, and then I will yield.

Mr. President, the arguments of the Senator from North Dakota are not contradictory in the slightest degree. The argument of the Senator from North Dakota was that, giving the German the same opportunity and placing him in a position where he is brought face to face with our conditions and requirements, he will rise to the occasion and he will advance just as rapidly and meet the requirements as we will. That argument has been bolstered up instead of being thrown down by the statement of the Senator from Iowa. Bring the foreign manufacturer here by any kind of a free-trade process, bring him as close to the American market as the American is, and with his scientific investigation and with his cheap labor he will find a way to keep pace with these ever-advancing requirements, and advance just as rapidly as the American.

There is not the same incentive for the creation of labor-saving machinery in Germany, or at least there has not been in the past, as there has been in the United States, on account of our higher-priced labor; but as they are reaching out for the world's markets, and reaching successfully for them, they will be able, I believe, to keep pace with us. We have no superior mortgage upon the future.

Mr. Page, representing E. W. Bliss Co., manufacturing machine tools, submits the following table showing comparative wages paid in Brooklyn and Paris:

Average wage paid per hour.

	Brooklyn.	Paris.
Machinists	$0.29 5/10	$0.17 1/10
Die makers	.36 2/10	.18 5/10
Blacksmiths	.37 1/10	.22 1/10
Laborers	.20	.11

Now, Mr. President, I want to take up the question of saws, and so forth. The present ad valorem duty under this paragraph, 37, is 24.30 per cent; the proposed duty is 12 per cent, or just one-half.

The United States produced, in 1910, $12,122,000.

Mr. Atkins, of the Atkins Saw Works, testifies that saws are not imported to any great extent, but the foreign product can be sold here for about the same price as the domestic.

The domestic competition at the present time is exceedingly keen, and with the protection we are able at present to keep out practically all foreign saws. The cost of the product put on the market has averaged for 13 years but 8 per cent less than the selling price.

Now, I ask candidly, can anyone complain when the selling price of a product for 13 years has been but 8 per cent more than the actual cost of production, and if there is no greater return on the investment than 8 per cent, is there any occasion for us to reduce the tariff so that there may be greater competition? I have here a table showing the wages paid laborers in producing saws in the United States and in France and Germany, and I will ask to introduce it as a part of my remarks:

Wages paid.

	France.	United States.
Sawsmiths	20 cents per hour	40 to 47½ cents per hour.
Filers	16 to 18 cents per hour	25 to 30 cents per hour.
Toothers	14 to 15 cents per hour	20 to 30 cents per hour.
Laborers	$1 per day	$1.75 per day.

Wages paid in United States to sawsmiths, per hour, 40 to 47½ cents. Same in Germany, per hour, 9.6 cents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the United States is a considerable exporter of saws to other countries.

Mr. McCUMBER. We export, I think, to Mexico; we export a few for the lumber industries in northwestern Canada. I think Canada, perhaps, takes the greater portion of our exports. There is good reason for that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator allow me to state that the export of saws now amounts to more than a million dollars a year?

Mr. McCUMBER. All right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And there is practically no importation of saws. It is almost negligible—$55,000 worth.

I should like to ask the Senator this question: At what point would he be willing to reduce the tariff, if he is not willing to reduce it when it is sufficient to practically keep out all imports, and when the condition of the manufacture in this country is such that American manufacturers are exporting to other countries a considerable portion of what they make, and are selling that product in competition with the world, without any protective tariff—if he is not willing to reduce the tariff when such conditions exist, will he please state when he thinks an industry will be able to get along without this tax on the American people for its benefit?

Mr. McCUMBER. Here, again, is one of those occasions I mentioned awhile ago, that in fixing the rates of duty upon any article we should have something more before us than the mere cost of production at home and abroad. There are some articles where it probably would not make any difference whether we had any duty or not. There are certain sections of the country that we can reach on account of freight rates which a foreign country could not reach if we had no protection. There are some sections of an adjoining country, like Canada, that we can reach because of our proximity, our knowledge of their needs, and our freight rates, and we can sell to the people there because we can give immediate delivery, where they can not wait for their saws to be manufactured in some other country; and we may hold the Canadian trade, even though a foreign country could come in and take the New York or the New Orleans trade away from us.

Now, answering the other proposition of the Senator, I repeat that when a product is sold upon the American market under keen competition at a rate averaging, for 13 years, less than 8 per cent more than the cost of production, there is no occasion to take the chance of cutting that rate to see if we can get some saws from some other country to compete with our manufactures. We do not need competition if saws are sold that close. If we have close competition in our home markets, so as to make the selling price represent but a fair profit on the capital and labor employed, why do we want importations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator suggest what testimony he relies upon when he says that these saws have for 13 years been sold for 8 per cent above their cost?

Mr. McCUMBER. I just read the testimony.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will he state what testimony it is? Is it disinterested testimony, or is it the result of an investigation by the Government, or is it testimony of a man who comes here asking that the tax be perpetuated upon the people for his benefit?

Mr. McCUMBER. The testimony is presumed to be correct, and it shifts the burden to the Senator to now establish that it is incorrect. After we have established by a man who testifies on honor that, having gone over the entire 13 years and having made a computation of the cost of the product and the selling price by the factories, the result is as I have stated, then I have no reason to disbelieve him because possibly he may be interested. The average man who uses a saw can not tell what it costs to manufacture it. The manufacturer can tell, and I am compelled to go to that source of information because that is the only source. If the Senator will wait and let this bill go over, as I proposed it should, until the Government, a disinterested party, through its Tariff Board, can secure the testimony as to what is the cost of production at home and abroad and how close we are selling the saws, I will be willing then to base my conclusion upon the testimony that may be so produced.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Why does he reject the strong circumstantial evidence which the import, export, and manufacturing figures produce, when they show that the manufacturers of saws are selling nearly $1,000,000 worth of their product in this country every year; when that testimony, from the same official report, shows that the tariff at present is practically prohibitory, and that foreign factories are not able to sell any saws in this country—why does the Senator from North Dakota reject such official, conclusive testimony as that, which shows that the tariff is evidently prohibitory and is evidently not necessary to enable these manufacturers of saws to compete with the world?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not reject any testimony. I am not as anxious, probably, as is the Senator from Nebraska, that somebody else should produce the saws for the United States. I am perfectly satisfied that we should make every saw we use, and that not a single one should be imported as long as the competition is so close that we are able to sell them at a price only 8 per cent above the cost of production; and I am not seeking, as the Senator seeks in all cases, to induce somebody to introduce them. Probably a cent or 2 cents or 3 cents raise in selling price would bring in foreign saws; probably cutting the duty in two might allow the others to come in and get half of the trade. I am not saying what the result would be. I can only give an illustration in another case, where the manufacturer of umbrella frames testified that if they sold their umbrella frames for 1 cent more than they were receiving, the foreign product would come in; and that 1 cent was sufficient for them to hold the United States trade, and I am willing they should have it. I am willing to pay the American price, if it is only a fair price.

Now, Mr. President, I come to paragraph 38, screws, etc. I will be through in a moment.

The present duty ranges from 55.73 to 11.11 per cent. It is proposed to reduce the duty to 25 per cent—a little less than half the tariff duty on the several classes.

Mr. Russell, representing the American Hardware Co., gives the following table of German export price and American cost of screws.

German export price and American cost of screws.

Sizes.	Per gross.
	German price.	American cost.
A	$0.0367	$0.037
B	.0473	.043
C	.051	.048
D	.071	.079
E	.0867	.088
F	.1105	.116
G	.122	.127
H	.189	.165
I	.248	.25
J	.378	.312
K	.472	.406

Of course we can not get the foreign cost of production as we can the home cost, but, taking the German selling price, we find a certain class per gross is 0.0367 cent. In this country it is 0.037, just three one-thousandths more. Class B in this country represents a cost of about 4 cents and 7 mills, and the selling price in Germany is about 4 cents and 3 mills.

Here we should have the Tariff Commission report. We need it to get the cost of production to the Germans, in order to know exactly what the duty should be.

Mr. Russell also gives comparison of wages paid in the United States in their factories for various occupations and in England:

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. While we may not have the figures as to Germany, we have in the census of manufactures of 1905 figures from which we can determine with reasonable accuracy the labor cost in this country. According to that report——

Mr. McCUMBER. I have the labor cost here. I was just going to introduce it.

Mr. SIMMONS. You have it from an interested witness. I am going to give it, if the Senator will permit me, from a Government publication, which, I think, is a little bit more reliable.

Mr. McCUMBER. It may be. I have the Government publication. Let us see how they differ.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am speaking from the census of manufactures for the year 1911. The entire wages paid in the manufacture of screws that year was half a million dollars, and the product was valued at $2,000,000. The percentage of labor cost was 26 per cent. Even if the cost here is twice as high as it is abroad, and the labor cost here is 26 cents, then the foreign labor cost must be about 13 cents. The duty carried in this bill is 25 per cent on screws, which is 12 per cent more than the difference between the labor cost here and in Europe, according to this official report.

Again, Mr. President, in 1910 there were imported into this country, in dollars and cents, screws to the value of only $1,093. That was the total importation of screws into this country, while the domestic production of screws in that year was $6,641,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what I gave here was the selling price in Germany and the manufacturing price in the United States. I have not stated that the 25 per cent was not sufficient. I have simply stated that we have no basis of figuring the German cost of production on which I can base a conclusion of what the tariff ought to be, and hence I desire to have the report of the board.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. I will be through in a minute, and then I will give the Senator the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not only the Senator from North Carolina, but the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and others on the other side seem to have an abhorrence of the American people ever exporting anything, and if they do export they ought to be punished for it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; on the contrary——

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, let us see how much we are exporting to Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Are we sending any cutlery into Germany? Are we sending cloths into England? Why should we be punished because we can reach Canada a little cheaper than they can, and, it may be, without making large profits we can reach some of the South American Republics?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. In a moment. As an American citizen I would feel that we ought to have the same right to import articles into Germany that Germany has to import articles into the United States. I do not find a great deal of complaint because the German tariff keeps out our products or because the tariff of any other country keeps out the American products, but there seems to be great complaint if our tariffs are so levied that they happen to keep out entirely some of the foreign products. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from North Dakota has misstated my position.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated it as a conclusion only.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not abhor, I do not dread, I do not object to a condition under which American manufacturers are able to export a part, either large or small, of their manufactured products. I glory in such a condition. But when they are able to do it it is conclusive evidence that they do not need to tax the American people in order to compete with foreign manufacturers in this country. That is the position I take, and it is a position that the Senator from North Dakota can not refute.

Whenever manufacturers in this country are able to export the goods which they make here with American labor and sell them in foreign lands year after year, that fact is conclusive that those manufacturers have no legitimate need of protection, even upon the Republican theory, against foreign manufacturers to sell their goods in this country.

Mr. McCUMBER. If on account of freight rates we can ship steel rails or any character of steel goods into northwestern Canada cheaper than England can transport them from Montreal overland into the same region, the Senator's conclusion would be that, therefore, we should have no protection against Great Britain because, forsooth, we can reach some point of contiguous territory cheaper than Great Britain can.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the evidence does not show, and the Senator can not show, that the exports of the United States in steel or any other goods are confined to Canada. The fact is that every year we export $240,000,000 worth of steel products to other countries, and that is by no means confined to Canada.

The Senator from North Dakota seems to have Canada on the brain. The fact, however, is that we are exporting these goods to almost every country in the world. The Senator himself can go to Germany and find American-made goods on sale in Germany—agricultural implements, saws, hammers, and other goods made in this country under the protective tariff.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is getting wild in his statement. I do not think he will find many American saws in Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator say that American——

Mr. McCUMBER. He may find some American machinery, however, in Germany that is of an advanced type over what they have for a while until they duplicate it there.

The Senator seems to have an aversion against the United States being an exporter. I thank God if we can put anything into Germany over a tariff wall or into England or into any other country, and I insist that because of the fact that we can and do export a large quantity of the products it is no evidence that we do not need any protection.

Mr. President, the Senator who is now in the chair [Mr. NELSON] knows of the long fight we had to retain our tariff on grain, because it was claimed that while we were heavy exporters of flour and grain we did not need protection against the Canadian product. When we had the reciprocity proposition before us and it was thought for a moment that we would have free imports from Canada, all our products went down to the lowest possible level. Just as soon as it became apparent that the bill would not be passed a year ago last winter, that moment the products went up, and when we finally passed it, down they went again; and when the Canadians voted against our reciprocity pact every agricultural product went up, and that notwithstanding the fact that we were exporting.

Yet in the face of those facts Senators will have the audacity to stand up here and say it is practically certain that if we are exporting any product we necessarily do not need any protection upon that product. Freight rates, contiguous territory, immediate demand, ability to immediately supply a demand, and a thousand other things have very much to do with the question of our exporting and very much more effect sometimes than the question of the tariffs.

Now, I am coming to the umbrella question. On umbrella ribs the present ad valorem duty is 50 per cent. The proposed ad valorem duty is 30 per cent. The United States production is about $1,000,000. Our imports for 1911 were only $10,566 worth. But when you figure the price of umbrella ribs you will find that is quite a factor. Mr. Forsythe, representing the National Umbrella Frame Co., of Philadelphia, testifies that the paragon frame, which enters into the better class of umbrellas, is sold in the market for 11½ cents, ready to be put on the handle and the cover. An umbrella that is covered on that frame will cost the consumer anywhere from 80 cents to $30, as the handle and the cover make the price. He testifies:

> We could not add one cent to the price of that frame; it would allow the foreign goods to enter the market.

In other words, 1 cent difference would give the foreigner the business. But, to make dead sure that he will get that business, this bill gives him 2 cents, or 20 per cent ad valorem, difference.

Suppose, now, that you can save the umbrella maker these 2 cents. Who is going to be benefited by it? Will the retailer sell an 80-cent umbrella for 78 cents because of this tariff reduction? Will the retailer sell a $30 umbrella for $29.98 instead of $30 because of this reduction? The public will get no benefit out of it. It is infinitesimal. Yet it is in line with this everlasting desire to punish the manufacturer.

Mr. President, I turn to lead-bearing ores and lead bullion. The present ad valorem duty ranges from 63.45 per cent to 54.70 per cent. The proposed ad valorem duty—I am speaking now of lead ore—is 25 per cent, much less than one-half. The present ad valorem duty on the bullion is 105.79 per cent. The proposed ad valorem duty is 25 per cent, or less than one-quarter.

Now, I am compelled to return again to the testimony of witnesses. Of course they are interested, but I have assumed that the man who is engaged in that business knows more than I do who do not buy a pound of lead in a year.

Mr. Burridge, representing the Coeur d'Alene lead-mining interest, says that the New York price 4.4 cents per pound; the cost of producing and marketing that lead is 4.7 cents, or 3 mills more than what he gets for it. It is because of the by-product that it affords a profit. After crediting the value of the by-product, which is generally silver, against the cost of producing the lead there is less than 1 cent a pound margin on a market price of 4.4 cents per pound.

The importations of lead bullion last year were 23,871,078.28 pounds. The revenue received from that was $515,441.84. The value of the importations was $551,000 in round numbers. The United States exports 481,333 pounds. We produce 10,062,000 pounds in round numbers. Mr. Burridge also testifies that if the proposed rate should go into effect the price would go down to about 3½ cents a pound, which would mean the closing of their lead mills.

Now, I believe what he says will happen unless they can lower the labor price. And then what would happen? After you have closed the mills that produce 10,062,000 pounds, or nearly one-half of that used in the United States, will the people pay less or more for the product? Decrease your supply and the product is bound to advance. The effect of closing those mills would be a triple disaster. It would deprive many thousands of people of employment, it would increase rather than decrease the cost to the consumer, and it would probably decrease our revenue.

Mr. Rock, representing the Coeur d'Alene lead district of Idaho, says that when the price in New York falls below 4 cents the mines will have to close in Idaho. That is one of the principal productions of that State, and yet you would strike this blow at the great industry of a State without giving any benefit whatever to the general consumer.

Mr. Burridge also testifies that wages paid in this country are, per day, $3.50; in Mexico they are 62.5 cents.

Mr. North, representing the Mine Owners' Association of Coeur d'Alene, testifies as to the wages paid: In Spain men, per day, 30 to 56 cents; boys, per day, 20 to 40 cents. He represents the labor organizations.

Now compare 20 to 40 cents with $3.50 in this country, and then figure it out for yourself, because it needs no pencil computation to determine what proportion of the cost of this lead is in the labor and how much of a duty it would require to equalize the labor conditions.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal said on the general proposition of a protective tariff. There is a simple axiom of success which works with mathematical accuracy, that applies with the same force to a nation that it applies to an individual and which no sophistry or specious argument can ever unsettle. It is this: That all commercial success is measured by and depends upon the amount of sales over purchases. The farmer who raises $3,000 worth of cereals and pays out $3,000 for meats and flour and products and hired help other than his own family is not one cent better off at the end of the year.

But, Mr. President, if he raises his own meats and vegetables to the amount of a thousand dollars, if he then hires his own family, whom he is bound to support, and pays them $500, and then spends about $500 for articles which he does not produce, he is a thousand dollars better off at the end of the year. What applies to the individual applies to 90,000,000 individuals making up this great Nation. When this country, through its individuals, sells abroad $2,000,000,000 worth of material a year and buys back $1,500,000,000, nobody can deny that the Nation itself, through its people, is worth $500,000,000 more at the end of the year than it was at the beginning of the year. If it keeps that in the United States, and if it continues that for 10 years, it is $5,000,000,000 better off.

Mr. President, that is exactly what we have done under the Dingley tariff. Under that tariff for about 10 years of its operation the balance of trade measured $5,000,000,000 taken out from the coffers of the old country and landed in the United States. That $5,000,000,000, or so much of it as stayed at home and did not go back to Europe in the shape of expenses of tourists, entered into our banks. Those dollars employed labor; it opened up new sections of the country; they built railroads; they made everybody prosperous.

Take that $500,000,000 a year and transfer that balance of trade against us, and the result would be pauperism throughout the United States in a single year. The only way that we can hold the balance of trade against countries whose standard of living is below ours, and whose labor wage is much below ours, is to place a tariff that will prevent their goods coming in at a less price than similar articles can be produced for a reasonable profit is this country.

Mr. President, I want to give you a single illustration of this during the operation of the Wilson-Gorman bill. The last year before that bill went into effect the balance of trade between the United States and Great Britain was $343,000,000 in our favor with that single country. The very next year after that law went into operation the balance of trade was in favor of Great Britain to the extent of exactly $343,000,000. It was just reversed, making $686,000,000 difference to the American workman. I deny that any man can claim that the conditions which were produced at that time were beneficial to the United States. Goods were cheaper, it is true, but we had nothing with which to buy them, and consternation spread like a cloud over the entire country.

So, Mr. President, I say that it is the duty of every Government to so shape its legislation, to so exert its diplomatic endeavors, that we shall always sell abroad more than we purchase from abroad; and not only, Mr. President, do we make the difference of $500,000,000 a year, as we have been making it in the last 12 years, but remember the things that we produce and sell abroad are perishable articles; they are grown or made in one year and consumed in the next, while that which we get in return for them—gold dollars of the United States—are good this year and will be good a hundred years from to-day, if we can just keep them in our country.

So, Mr. President, I have no hesitancy in saying that I am opposed to this proposition that seeks to destroy the interests of the manufacturers of steel products in the United States, knowing that the farmers on the plains of the Dakotas and of Minnesota must necessarily suffer by reason of the lack of the prosperity that would follow a bill of this character. The price of our products depends upon the reasonable prosperity of the consuming public, and any act that destroys that prosperity must necessarily react on all the people.

DESIGNATION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to make a request in the nature of a privileged matter. The Vice President will necessarily be detained from the Senate to-morrow, and I ask unanimous consent that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] be designated as President pro tempore for that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 319), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate has elected HENRY CABOT LODGE, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice President on Saturday, May 25, 1912.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 320), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate has elected HENRY CABOT LODGE, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice President on Saturday, May 25, 1912.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 25, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 24, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; creating, re-creating in Thy ministrations for the needs of Thy children, ever going forward to what, whitherward we know not, but with perfect faith and confidence in Thy wisdom, power, and goodness. We most fervently pray that we may be wise in our conceptions, firm in our convictions, moving ever onward in a straight line toward what we know to be right as revealed in the incomparable life and character of Thy son Jesus Christ, the world's great exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 20586) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, with Senate amendments, and to concur in the Senate amendments. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] yesterday objected, but has now withdrawn his objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it was stated yesterday that this bill was in the hands of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The gentleman should also make a request that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from further consideration of the bill, and to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from further consideration of the bill H. R. 20586 and to concur in the Senate amendments. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, this is the day set apart by the rules for the consideration of pension bills. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that he is anxious to have considered to-day a deficiency bill, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], chairman of the Naval Committee, desires to continue the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. I ask unanimous consent that the first legislative day, provided it does not fall on Monday or Wednesday, shall be substituted for to-day, under the rule now applying to the second and fourth Fridays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say to the gentleman from Missouri that this Congress has been most liberal in the passage of pension bills. It has passed a bill carrying, it is estimated, $35,000,000, and it has passed a very large number of private pension bills. We have agreed on a program to sidetrack every other bill in order to get the appropriation bills through. There are other important matters waiting for the appropriation bills; there is the compensation act, the contempt bill, and a number of other bills that the people of the United States are greatly interested in, which it has been agreed shall be set aside until the appropriation bills are in the Senate. There will be another pension day before this Congress adjourns—June 14—and there will be an opportunity then for gentlemen to call up their pension bills. As far as I am concerned, I intend to insist on the program that has been agreed on in the House, and I hope the House will sustain me and see that nothing comes in the way of these appropriation bills until they are passed. Therefore I must object.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order of to-day.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 319, to supply urgent deficiencies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 319.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUSSELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to inquire, for the benefit of those present, if this motion should be voted down, then would the regular order provided by the rules come up?

The SPEAKER. The situation is this: A motion to take up an appropriation bill is privileged. The Chair would feel bound after this matter is disposed of, if not voted down, to recognize the gentleman from Tennessee to take up the naval appropriation bill. If the House prefers to take up pension bills, it can vote down the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I desire to accommodate the leaders of the House, and I am only asking this for the information of others.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to consider this resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $55,000: Provided, That no appropriation for contingent expenses of the Senate or House of Representatives shall be expended for telegrams hereafter sent except such as are sent on official business upon the authority of officers, whips, or committees of the Senate or House, and bills therefor shall be payable only on approval by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make, or reserve, if the gentleman desires, the point of order against the paragraph just read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the committee in recommending $55,000 to supply deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House has reported the following proviso:

Provided, That no appropriation for contingent expenses of the Senate or House of Representatives shall be expended for telegrams hereafter sent except such as are sent on official business upon the authority of officers, whips, or committees of the Senate or House, and bills therefor shall be payable only on approval by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

It appeared in a statement made to the committee by the Chief Clerk of the House that for telegrams sent by Members of the House during the present session there had already been paid to the Western Union Telegraph Co. $4,279 and to the Postal Telegraph Co. $1,493; that there were outstanding and unpaid bills from both of these companies aggregating $7,800; and that it would require to meet the expenditures for similar purposes during the remainder of the fiscal year about $5,000. So that the House of Representatives is paying out at the Government rate for messages sent by Members of Congress in the neighborhood of $20,000 a year. The information submitted to the committee as to the character of some of the telegrams and as to the extent to which the practice is followed, led the committee to believe that public funds should no longer be utilized for this purpose. It was realized, however, that under authority of the House at various times it is necessary for the officers of the House, for various committees, and for the men who are popularly designated as the "whips" of the parties, to send to Members of the House or to individuals telegrams of such character that there could be no doubt they were upon strictly official business, and the committee excepted from the prohibition telegrams of such a character, requiring, however, the accounts to be audited by the Committee on Accounts.

There is no law at present which authorizes the payment for telegrams sent by Members of Congress out of any appropriation which is made for the service, either in the Senate or in the House. It is a practice that has been long in existence, but in recent years it seems to have been very greatly accentuated. The committee, believing that an abuse existed, and having the information before it, recommended this provision in order to remedy that abuse. That has been the policy adopted by the committee during this session from the outset. Whenever in its investigations facts developed which led the members of the committee to believe that public funds should no longer be used for a purpose for which they have been used, either under the sanction of custom or in pursuance of existing statutes, the committee has recommended such legislation as would eliminate the abuse, and it is in accordance with that practice that this provision has been incorporated.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that about $20,000 a year is the amount of these telegram bills of the Members of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For this year it will be about $18,572, as nearly as can be estimated.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. What proportion of that $18,000 is represented by telegrams sent by whips?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has never been segregated, but my impression from the information that has been submitted to the committee is that it is not a very large part of it. Whatever abuse exists does not exist from the sending of telegrams by representatives of the parties to Members in order to have them present at times when votes of an important character are to be taken.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, I ask for information purely. If this be adopted, will it be the fact that no Member can communicate upon strictly public business with his constituents at public expense?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That will be the fact.

Mr. KOPP. Does the gentleman think there is any more reason why the Government should pay for communications by mail than by wire, granted that the communications are on strictly public business?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether there is such a necessity or exigency in the transaction of public business by Members that requires them to use the telegraph service. The Government conducts the postal service, and it is merely a question in extending the franking privilege as to whether the rest of the community that uses the postal service shall be compelled to pay for service which is given to Members of Congress to facilitate the transaction of public business. Whether there be any distinction that can be drawn, here is an appropriation made for the service of the House of Representatives. During the last few years it has been encroached upon in this way to an extent which is now believed to be unjustifiable.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. If this provision remains in the joint resolution and becomes law, then we can expend the public money by having a whip send out telegrams all over the country to Members that on a particular day a vote will be taken, but denying to Members of the House the right under this new provision to send important telegrams on official business to any of their constituents.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the gentleman from Tennessee would not be able to notify his constituents by wire that they had received the favorable sanction of the President in receiving some appointment. He would know it either from being sent by mail or reading it in the press the next day.

Mr. AUSTIN. But there is no emergency or exception made permitting a Member to send a telegram to any of his constituents on important official business, but there is here an authorization for the whips of this House to notify at public expense Members of Congress that they ought to be here to discharge their duties, and that is a distinction that ought not to be made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, that is true; but when we ascertained that the monthly accounts of some Members run as high as two hundred and some odd dollars, and single telegrams cost as much as $60, while perhaps some Members may be penalized by being compelled to pay for the messages to be sent in the transaction of their public business, yet in order to stop such Members it is necessary perhaps to enact legislation which may embarrass other Members.

Mr. AUSTIN. But the gentleman does not answer my question in reference to the——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will answer the gentleman's question. Members will not be permitted to send telegrams at the expense of the House of Representatives on business to constituents or to anybody else, and the exceptions were put in for whips because it is not an uncommon practice for Members to be excused for definite or indefinite periods of time, and this would permit them to be notified that on certain occasions important votes would be taken. I would suggest to the gentleman that if he thinks that to be improper it is easy to remedy it by a motion to strike out the provision for the whips of the House, but I hope he will not resort to the other method of preventing this reform because he thinks it does not go far enough.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. How much time did the gentleman from New York have?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York had five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman reserved the point of order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand just how the gentleman from New York got five minutes when the gentleman from Illinois merely reserved the point of order; he has unlimited time if the Chair desires to hear him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was not arguing the point of order.

Mr. MANN. He is not discussing the point of order; this is under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that when a bill is considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House the time of any gentleman is limited unless the House extends it by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman having more time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not desire to occupy any more time.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have five minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman a few questions along the line we are discussing. Here is an important bill, for instance, coming before a committee affecting interests in my district. I am precluded from sending telegrams to the interested parties that on to-morrow or the next day that committee is to have a hearing on an important piece of local legislation. I can not expend any of the public funds for that purpose, but our whips can expend this money to notify absent Members, some of whom, perhaps, are not away from the House on leave of absence, that they ought to be here on a certain day in order to vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest this to the gentleman: That when important hearings of his committee are to be had and it is necessary to notify some particular persons by wire in his district that such hearings are to be had, so as to afford them an opportunity to be here, the provision here which authorizes the sending, at the expense of the House, of telegrams upon authority of committees would enable his constituents to be notified at the expense of the Government instead of at the expense of himself.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to say to the gentleman, can not this reform and reduction be largely obtained by a strict compliance with the exceptions and a discrimination between the kind and character of the messages sent at public expense? I never sent a telegram at public expense except on official business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I have not made any charge against the gentleman, and I do not propose to do so.

Mr. AUSTIN. But the gentleman has in a general way stated that these official telegraph tolls have increased, and have gone to the extent where they amount to about $8,000 or $10,000 and certain Members of this House have run monthly bills amounting to $250.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I repeated the statement conveyed to the committee by officials of the House who have knowledge of the facts.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman if his investigation shows any Members of the House have abused the privilege and have been sending private messages at public expense.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have stated as definitely as I intend to do what the facts are; that I believe an abuse has existed, and that this will correct the abuse.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then, why deprive Members here who are literally carrying out and observing the law——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I repeat again, there is no law which either authorizes the gentleman to send messages at Government rates or to have them paid for out of the funds appropriated for the service of the House. It is a custom that has grown up and been acquiesced in. We believe it should be stopped.

Mr. LEWIS, Mr. MANN, and Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, if he happens to have the information at hand, what the Government rate is as distinguished from the private rate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the law of 1866 for certain concessions granted to telegraph companies the Postmaster General is authorized to fix the rate upon Government messages. It can not be stated in a few words. It is fixed from time to time—I think, annually—by the Postmaster General, and is regulated by the number of words in the message and by distances also.

Mr. LEWIS. Is it not very much lower than the private rate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe it is; yes.

Mr. PAGE. One cent a word.

Mr. MANN. The average is about 1 cent a word, is it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain. I read the statute, but did not pay much attention to the rates. I was interested in ascertaining whether Members of Congress could send a certain class of telegrams at Government rates.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has again expired.

Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts, and Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Some years ago, I think, nearly every Member of Congress possessed a telegraphic frank of either the Western Union Telegraph Co. or the Postal Telegraph Co., and possibly many of them on both; and I suppose most telegrams were sent by Members of Congress by franks, and they were supposed to be used only on official business. When the telegraph franks were abolished it had been then the custom in the Senate to send telegrams at the Government rate at the expense of the Senate contingent fund, and it gradually became the custom of the House. I do not know how far that custom has been abused. Perhaps it needs investigation, perhaps it needs correction; but I fail to see the justice of the proposition which in effect permits almost every Senator of the United States to send telegrams at Government expense and permits 50 or 60 majority Members of the House to send telegrams at Government expense, but permits no one else in the House to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This does not permit the Senators. It puts the Senators in the same category with the Members of the House.

Mr. MANN. Almost every Senator is chairman of a committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not intended to permit the chairmen of committees to send messages.

Mr. MANN. But what is the fact? The moment an order of this kind passes the committee passes a resolution authorizing its chairman to send such telegrams as he pleases. In fact, the committee will adopt the same course.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. What is there in this law to permit the passing of a resolution authorizing every member of a committee to use the telegraph at public expense?

Mr. MANN. It probably would not be done. But the other is not only probable, but it would have to be so. When the chairman of a committee wishes to send a telegram about official business no one presumes that he will wait two or three days in order to get his committee together to find out whether he can send a telegram that afternoon. I will not say that the proposition is absurd, because that might be considered a reflection on the report of a distinguished committee, but I think it is ill-considered and unfair. I have occasion as minority leader to send more telegrams than the average committee ever had, or more than I did as chairman of one of the greatest committees of this House. I could send these telegrams at my own expense, and possibly ought to do so, while the chairman of the "committee on lonesome roads" could send such telegrams as he pleased at Government expense. What is the fact?

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MANN. What is the fact? These telegrams have grown in number because of these investigating committees. It may be necessary. I do not deny the necessity, because I do not know. I presume they have not been sent without some occasion, but the great majority of the telegrams, where they have amounted to a considerable quantity to a Member, have been sent, I dare say, by the chairmen of investigating committees. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask the gentleman if he can conceive of any reason why a partisan telegram should be paid for by the Government any more than one pertaining to the Government business. This provides that the whips shall send telegrams purely for a partisan purpose in order to get their side here to attend to business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. No; not now. I did not interrupt the gentleman, and he had 15 or 20 minutes. I do not consider that the sending of telegrams by whips in the House is a partisan matter. How else can it be done? The sending of telegrams to absent Members is not, as was suggested, in a way, by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], for the benefit of absent Members. It is for the benefit of the Members here attending to business who want to bring back occasionally to do real service Members who do not attend to business. That is for the interest of those who are here.

Now, nobody can expect that you elect a whip for the purpose of expending his own personal money in sending telegrams throughout the country. It may be that we ought to all contribute to that on each side, but I dare say that that would not be easy to do.

Now, the gentleman refers to partisan telegrams. I have found occasion to send telegrams about official business——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I want to get through.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire five minutes?

Mr. MANN. No. I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is legislation. It does not pretend to be anything else.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It tends to reduce expenditures, and I insist it is in order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois please state the point of order?

Mr. MANN. "No appropriation for contingent expenses of the Senate or House of Representatives shall be expended for telegrams hereafter sent except such," and so forth. The Committee on Appropriations is not a legislative committee. It has no authority to report upon a matter of legislation, and the only way that this item could be in order under the Holman rule would be by a favorable report of a committee having jurisdiction of the legislation. The Committee on Appropriations did not have jurisdiction of the legislation. It is not a limitation upon this appropriation. This appropriation is for the contingent fund of the House. The item applies to any "appropriation for contingent expenses of the Senate or House." Hence it is a legislative proposition, and a legislative proposition which does not in any way affect the amount of the appropriation in the bill, and it could only be in order upon the report of a committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter. That would probably be the Committee on Accounts, but certainly it would have to be a committee having jurisdiction of the legislative proposition, which the Committee on Appropriations does not have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary that the committee should have jurisdiction of certain subjects in order to take advantage of the so-called Holman rule to effect economies and reforms in public expenditures. The rule is paragraph 2 of Rule XXI:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto——

The SPEAKER. What page is that on?

Mr. FITZGERALD. On page 400. It provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any persons paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

It is apparent that if this provision will prohibit expenditures out of the amounts heretofore appropriated it does affect the amount covered in the bill, because it makes unnecessary appropriations that would otherwise be required.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], in construing the rule—I think properly—held that it was to be construed to give it the beneficial effect intended when it was adopted. The object is to enable the House to place provisions in these measures that will retrench the public expenditure by effecting proper and important reforms. It is impossible to reach them in any other way. If it can not be done in this way, then it can not be done at all.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, just a word on the point of order. Doubtless the presiding officer takes notice of the law as it is, touching the use of the contingent fund. This is a proposed deficiency provision to control expenditures from that fund. It is so stated—

Provided, That no appropriation for contingent expenses of the Senate or House of Representatives shall be expended for telegrams—except the exceptions stated. It seems to me it does curtail expenditures. Without regard to the merits of the proposition, it seems to me that under the so-called Holman rule it is in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not personally see any difficulty about this at all. The Holman rule first provides that matters shall be in order which shall retrench expenditures—

By the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States.

This does not do that. Second—

By the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

This does not do that. Third—

Or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

This does not do that. It does not reduce. If it were an amendment, it might reduce.

Then comes the proposition—

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The first item is not a matter of retrenchment of expenditures except in particular ways.

The last item provides that any legislation which shall retrench expenditures shall be in order, but that before it is in order it must have been recommended to the House by a committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter, and must be germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Holman rule, so called, provides—

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures—

How? First—

By the reduction of the number and salaries of the officers of the United States—

Which this bill does not do. Second—

By the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States—

Which this does not do.

Or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Which this does not do. And the point of order is sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows.

Page 1, line 10, insert:

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended for telegrams hereafter sent except such as are sent on official business upon the authority of officers, whips, or committees of the House, and bills therefor shall be payable only on approval by the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that the whole paragraph of the bill went out. I made the point of order on the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply ruled out the proviso.

Mr. MANN. But I made the point of order to the whole paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will decrease the amount from $55,000 to $54,000, I suppose that would bring it within the rule?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to find out the parliamentary situation.

Mr. MANN. The point of order went to the whole paragraph. I was not to be caught by the suggestion of the gentleman. I am too old in the game for that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to make the point of order only as to the proviso.

Mr. MANN. No; I made the point of order against the whole paragraph.

The SPEAKER. There is a remedy for that.

Mr. MANN. Of course. This is simply in the interest of orderly procedure.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the whole paragraph goes out if the point of order was made against it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, beginning at line 7, by inserting the following:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $55,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended for telegrams hereafter sent, except such as are sent on official business upon the authority of officers, whips, or committees of the House, and bills therefor shall be payable only on approval by the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order against the amendment that the amendment now offered by the gentleman authorizes payments out of the contingent fund for telegrams which are not now provided for by law and for which there is no authority of law.

The gentleman's amendment proposes to authorize the payment for telegrams sent by whips, by authority of officers of the House, and by committees of the House. There is now no authority of law for the payment for telegrams sent by committees of this House or by whips of the House. There is no such thing known in the law as a whip, and the gentleman seeks to enact legislation authorizing payment out of the contingent fund for telegrams sent by whips of the House, whatever they may be, which are not now authorized by law; and instead of being a retrenchment of expenditures, it is a direct authority to increase expenditures. It is not the duty of the House to legislate in this way for the purpose of correcting any errors which the officials of the House may make in construing law. There is no authority of law, and, so far as I know, nobody has ever pretended that there was any authority of law, for the sending of such telegrams at the expense of the Government. I believe the whole matter of paying for these telegrams probably ought to be stopped. Certainly if stopped as to Members, it ought to be stopped as to chairmen of committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. It may be a confession of ignorance, but, nevertheless, it is a fact that the Chair does not know. The Chair always supposed there was a law authorizing Members of the House to send telegrams on public business at what are called Government rates. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Illinois on one thing at any rate, and that is that the man who acts as minority leader has great occasion to send telegrams on public business; and, as far as that is concerned, the Speaker has, too.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the Speaker has more occasion than any other Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the Speaker has more than the minority leader, but thinks it may be true.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, there is no law, as has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois, which authorizes the sending of telegrams by any Member of the House or officer of the House at the Government expense. It has simply been done by custom. The only law on the statute book is an act passed in 1866, to be found in the Revised Statutes, a copy of which I hold in my hands, and I will read the law if the Chair desires.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. The act of 1866, which provided for the construction of telegraph lines over post roads and the public domain and over navigable streams, provided that every telegraph corporation that accepted the benefits of this act should, before it proceeded to build, file with the Postmaster General an acceptance of the terms of the act. All the telegraph companies then doing business and all that have been doing business since have filed with the Attorney General the acceptance of the terms of the act of 1866, which has been modified to some extent. The act is as follows:

An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

Be it enactel, etc., That any telegraph company now organized, or which may hereafter he organized, under the laws of any State in this Union shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States: Provided, That such lines of telegraph shall be so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct the navigation of such streams and waters or interfere with the ordinary travel on such military or post roads. And any of said companies shall have the right to take and use from such public lands the necessary stone, timber, and other materials for its posts, piers, stations, and other needful uses in the construction, maintenance, and operation of said lines of telegraph, and may preempt and use such portion of the unoccupied public lands subject to preemption through which its said lines of telegraph may be located as may be necessary for its stations, not exceeding 40 acres for each station, but such stations shall not be within 15 miles of each other.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That telegraph communications between the several departments of the Government of the United States and their officers and agents shall, in their transmission over the lines of any of said companies, have priority over all other business and shall be sent at rates to be annually fixed by the Postmaster General.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the rights and privileges hereby granted shall not be transferred by any company acting under this act to any other corporation, association, or person: Provided, however, That the United States may at any time after the expiration of five years from the date of the passage of this act, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of any or all of said companies at an appraised value, to be ascertained by five competent disinterested persons, two of whom shall be selected by the Postmaster General of the United States, two by the company interested, and one by the four so previously selected.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by this act such company shall file their written acceptance with the Postmaster General of the restrictions and obligations required by this act. (14 Stat., 221; Rev. Stat., sec. 5263 et seq.)

Now, the rates of pay fixed by the Postmaster General are as follows:

RATES OF PAY FOR COMMUNICATIONS BY TELEGRAPH.

(Order No. 2436.)

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., July 1, 1909.

Pursuant to the authority vested in the Postmaster General by the act of Congress entitled "An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 24, 1866, and by the Revised Statutes of the United States, Title LXV, I hereby fix the rates at which such communications as the said statutes prescribe (not including those passing over circuits established by the Chief of the Weather Bureau, Department of Agriculture) shall be sent during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1909, and terminating June 30, 1910, by the several companies within the effect of said statutes, as follows:

For day messages containing not more than 20 words, exclusive of place from and date, 20 cents, not exceeding 1,000 miles, and 1 cent for each additional word. One-quarter of this rate to be added for each 500 miles, or fraction thereof, but no rate on a message of 20 words to be more than 40 cents, nor on an additional word more than 2 cents. The rate between all points in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall be 20 cents for 20 words, and 1 cent for each additional word.

In cases where the price of a message, determined as herein provided, shall include a fraction of a cent, such fraction, if less than one-half, is to be disregarded; if one-half or more, it is to be counted as 1 cent.

For night messages not exceeding 20 words, exclusive of place from and date, 15 cents for any distance within 2,000 miles, and for greater distances 25 cents; in each case 1 cent for each additional word.

Instead of computing the actual distances of transmission, the distance for payment shall in all cases be taken absolutely to be the number of miles between the capital of the State or Territory, or from the city of Washington if from within the District of Columbia, from within which (whatever the place) the message is sent, and the capital of the State or Territory, or the city of Washington if within the District of Columbia, within which (whatever the place) the message is received, as shown in the accompanying table, wherein such distances are given as computed upon the shortest practicable route between such capitals, and which is to be taken as part of this order.

But it is provided that if on the 1st day of July, 1909, or at any time during the ensuing year, any such company shall charge the public for a message of 10 words or less, exclusive of the date, address, and signature, a less rate than is herein fixed for 20 words, exclusive of place from and date, the rates here prescribed shall, as to such company, thenceforth during the year be reduced to the rates so charged to the public.

The statutes provide that telegrams between the several departments of the Government and their officers and agents, in their transmission over the lines of any such company, shall have priority over all other business. All officers of the United States sending such telegrams should indorse thereon the words "Official business," and should report to the Postmaster General any failure to transmit them in such priority and any charge made in excess of the rates above prescribed.

Each company will be allowed to charge for messages received from another line at the same rate as if received from the Government direct, at the point of transfer for transmission over its own line.

F. H. HITCHCOCK, Postmaster General.

Now, that is all on the statute books with reference to Government business done by telegraph companies, and that is all the law there is which authorizes telegrams to be sent over the various lines at rates fixed by the act of the Postmaster General. There is no law which authorizes the use of money for official business telegrams sent by Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I said at the outset that I had been unable to find any law by which the telegrams had been paid for out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that the gentleman from Georgia is correct in his statement as to the usage of the House and the Senate in sending telegrams at the Government expense and Government rates. I suppose the only way that the House, or any official of the House, or any Member of the House, or any committee of the House, can send at public expense telegrams paid for from the contingent fund would be by resolution passed by the House and Senate making the contingent fund available under the existing law, imposing such terms as the resolution might provide.

The SPEAKER. This proviso on the face of it at the first impression looks as if it was limiting the telegraph privileges, when, in fact, it develops that there is no law authorizing it at all, and the proviso is evidently new law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No amendment is in order until the point of order is disposed of, and I wish a ruling on the amendment first.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair was about to rule, that the amendment is out of order at this time.

The effect of this proviso is to create new law. Therefore the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is well taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, by adding, after line 6, the following:

"House of Representatives: For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $55,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid for telegrams hereafter sent by Representatives, Delegates, and Commissioners in Congress."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment, unless the gentleman from New York wishes to speak first.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the proviso.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain that motion as soon as the gentleman from Massachusetts has five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I merely wanted to have the matter pending while the gentleman from Massachusetts was speaking.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts, with that proviso pending, desire to address the House?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House upon the main question at some time before it is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman as soon as he answers the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know if a substitute would now be in order?

The SPEAKER. A germane substitute, of course, would be in order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then I offer the following substitute——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor, and when he has consumed five minutes the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee to offer his substitute.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall make the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, to strike out the proviso, which will give me the floor in the affirmative and the gentleman from New York can answer in the negative. I request that the amendment be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso:

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid for telegrams hereafter sent by Representatives, Delegates, and Commissioners in Congress."

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if this amendment, as originally offered by the gentleman from New York, passes, it is making this House work with old-fashioned tools. It is depriving us of our ability to do our duty and our business in the most modern and effective way. I myself, if I did not fortunately have the means for such things as elaborate telegrams, would be very seriously handicapped, indeed, if I could not send telegrams on Government business at the Government expense. Within a day or two the occupant of the Chair asked me to ascertain certain matters relative to a point of order which had been raised by a gentleman in this House. It required me to telegraph to parliamentarians in different parts of this Union. Scarcely a day passes when I am not obliged to send elaborate telegrams upon one subject or another. It is impossible for me to go to the chairmen of committees each time and get approval for what I wish to do. If I did not have the means to do it out of my own pocketbook, the House would be seriously handicapping me, and it is seriously handicapping every man in this House who is taking any real part in the work of the House.

What good purpose will it serve? You will check a little abuse of this privilege, I grant you, but at the expense of checking a small abuse you will handicap all of the Members of this House who never think of abusing that privilege. There are other ways of checking that abuse. If gentlemen really wish to check it, it is very easy for them to find out who is abusing that privilege, go to them in private, call their attention to the fact that they are abusing the privilege, and have that practice discontinued.

Mr. BUTLER. And require them to pay their own bills.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if it is not a fact that these bills can not be paid out of this contingent fund under the present custom until the Committee on Accounts approves of those bills, and if the Committee on Accounts had the nerve to assume the right to reject these telegrams that do not pertain to the public business, this abuse would cease?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, that is perfectly true; but it is——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I would like to answer the gentleman from Texas first. It is asking a great deal of the Committee on Accounts to do that. I am perfectly aware of that, but it seems to me that either the Committee on Accounts or the Sergeant at Arms ought to do it, rather than handicap the rest of the House for a saving of $20,000 a year. I really think that our services are increased hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth a year to the people of the United States by the very fact we can send telegrams on public business at public expense, because if we can not send them at public expense the gentleman knows they will not be sent in many cases when they ought to be sent, because Members are obliged to be economical.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman talks about interfering with a Member in his rights. The gentleman is present now, and it is currently admitted on all sides that there is no authority to pay for these telegrams out of the public funds. This amendment is to prevent that which is now unlawful.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, at the present time we may be getting at it in a roundabout way, but they are paid for out of the public funds; I do not care how the gentleman arrives at the result. What I am merely saying is this: In the first place the Government pays a great deal less for this service than we in our individual capacity would be compelled to pay for it if we had to do it. I am not arguing but what there is a better way of getting at this thing, but what I am saying is you are forcing us to build with worn-out tools, and that is what the gentleman from New York is trying to do. We are conducting business everywhere with the telephone, the telegraph, the automobile, the multigraph, the typewriter, and this is one of those instrumentalities.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have five minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. With the brilliant mind which the gentleman from Massachusetts has can he differentiate to any extent between sending a telegram over a wire and sending telephone messages over a wire? No one has proposed to take the telephones out of the office of the Committee on Appropriations or other offices, I believe. What is the distinction in theory between sending one by wire and sending the other by wire?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I make no distinction, but I think there is distinction made. My impression is that I have to pay my own long-distance calls. I am not sure whether I do or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You can telephone within the District.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I said long distance and on public business. I do not think we ought to be obliged to do it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, in naming these modern appliances for doing business, did the gentleman inadvertently forget the steam roller?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Nowadays we have a steam roller with pneumatic pushers on the other side of the House. I do not wish for five minutes more, because what I may have to say would be repetition.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman, is there any real reason why we should discriminate against ourselves in favor of the Senate on this proposition?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Well, I see no reason whatever, and, it seems to me, it is a good deal broader than that; it is a question of whether we are going to handicap ourselves for the sake of $20,000 in doing business that makes us efficient.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, it devolves upon the Committee on Accounts, as most of you know, to investigate these telegrams. I have spent quite a good deal of time in investigating the telegrams which have been sent. I want to say for the credit of the House that I find on investigation of the telegrams that, as a rule, this House has not violated its privileges at all. [Applause.] I found but few instances where individuals have sent telegrams on private business. I have seen a few telegrams that have been sent which ought to have been sent at private expense, but I am perfectly safe, after making an investigation, in saying that nine out of ten telegrams that are sent are sent on official business. Now, the telegram in some instances, in my judgment, is a longer telegram than might be sent. That is the greatest criticism I have to make in connection with it, that an individual Member sometimes, in sending a telegram, sends it as if he was sending a letter. He does not abbreviate as we ordinarily abbreviate telegrams in sending them on business. That is the greatest complaint I have to make and the most serious objection I have to the telegrams that are sent, but I take great pleasure in saying here now, if we are going to permit the sending of telegrams at all, that there is no serious complaint against the membership of this House for the telegrams which they have sent.

Mr. HARDY. Would these long telegrams be sent as lettergrams?

Mr. GARNER. The same rate applies.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The official of the House who scrutinizes these telegrams is not the gentleman from Missouri, but the Chief Clerk of the House; is not that the fact?

Mr. LLOYD. The telegrams are sent over to the office of the Sergeant at Arms and the Clerk of the House does not examine them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Clerk of the House came before the Committee on Appropriations in reference to these items of miscellaneous expenses of the House, and it was upon his statement, based upon personal knowledge by him in the discharge of his public duties, that I have made the statement here.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Sergeant at Arms does not pay out of the contingent fund at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman says that possibly not more than 10 per cent of these telegrams are improperly sent. If 10 per cent are being sent, that means $2,000 is being paid on the authority of the Committee on Accounts for which there can not be the slightest authority of law. The gentleman should not have one official coming before the committee and calling attention to abuses and then try to minimize them himself on the floor of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] yield to me so that I may ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] a question? Does the gentleman from New York take the position that the Committee on Accounts ought not to authorize the expenditure of money in the purchase of anything for the Members of the House that is not authorized by law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly I do; because I would not ask the Committee on Accounts to violate the law.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] ever made a requisition for anything that was not authorized by law?

Mr. LLOYD. Not that I have any knowledge of.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from New York has not sufficient knowledge of the law, then. He has made requisition on the Committee on Accounts that was not authorized by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I did, I hope the Committee on Accounts in the discharge of its duties did not pay the account. I would ask the gentleman to state what it is.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Accounts in auditing these different items, after a thorough investigation of the law, came to the conclusion that they had authority to make the authorization paying these accounts, and that their action made it law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be.

Mr. GARNER. But, if you must have beforehand an authorization of law for a comb and brush or a typewriter, then we could not authorize any of these things until you passed your statute and put it on the books.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me state to the gentleman from Texas that there are good lawyers in this House, and I do not include myself among the number——

Mr. MANN. You are very modest.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Who have examined the statute upon which the Government rate is extended to official business. And everyone who examined it and to whom I talked expressed the opinion that it did not include telegrams sent by Members of Congress to individuals. I do not put myself in the category of good lawyers, but it is upon those opinions that I have made the statement which I have.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to say in explanation to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that it was my misfortune that I was not in the room at the time the gentleman from New York made his statement. Therefore, I am not advised either as to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may have said or what representation was made by the Chief Clerk of the House to him. You are aware of the fact, of course, that all of these claims upon the contingent fund are paid through the Chief Clerk of the House. The disbursing clerk comes in contact with all these bills, and if that is the thing the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] made reference to in his speech he made a very proper reference to the effect that the clerk would have knowledge of all these bills. He has taken a very great interest in the matter.

I want to say that the Chief Clerk of the House is watching after the expenditures of the House in an exceedingly commendable way, and I have nothing but commendation for the course of the Chief Clerk in trying to cut down expenses. The only question I rose to consider was the question of what was the character of the telegrams that had been sent, and I thought it was due that the one who was charged with others in investigating these accounts and examining these telegrams should advise the House as to the character of them. And, as I said a moment ago, I take pleasure in repeating that the House, if they are to be authorized to send telegrams at all, if the telegraph bills are to be allowed, the Members of the House, in my judgment, with very few exceptions, are not violating this privilege that is given to them.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]?

Mr. LLOYD. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman inform me as to this: Is it not possible to correct this abuse without punishing innocent men?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, there are several men on the floor of this House that have knowledge of what has been done through the Committee on Accounts. The attention of that committee has been called in some instances to telegrams that were sent that ought not to have been, but I have not found a Member to whom such a suggestion was made who did not seem grateful for the information given him.

Mr. BUTLER. Correcting the abuse himself?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes. I do not think there is a man here who has sent a telegram that should not have been sent who will not take pleasure in correcting the abuse if his attention is called to it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. LLOYD. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think there is one consideration that has quite a bearing upon this question, and one that ought not to be overlooked, and that is this: That if Members could pay for official telegrams out of their own pocket at the same rates as the Government is charged, I think there would be far less objection to doing so. If Members send telegrams on official business at their own expense, paying for them themselves, they are required to pay a rate that is three or four times as much as the Government rate.

Mr. LLOYD. There is this about it, that the far western Members and the southern Members, whose homes are situated farthest from Washington, are the ones who send the most telegrams. The sending of telegrams does not mean much to a man living within a hundred miles of Washington City, and to such a man it makes little difference whether we make this restriction or not.

But it is a serious matter to the man who lives in the western part of the United States, who must pay a high rate for his messages. Members can reach their constituents who are within a radius of 400 miles of Washington in 24 hours by mail, but there are many Members here from a greater distance away who can not reach their constituents within less than four or five days by means of a letter.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If the gentleman will permit, I may say that to send a telegram to my own State at Government rates would cost somewhere from 15 to 20 cents for a message of 10 words. I would have to pay 50 cents to some places, and to the western part of the State 75 cents for a message of 10 words.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LLOYD. With pleasure.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is it not true, also, that constituents from far western States who are interested in legislation are not nearly as able to get here as my constituents, for instance? Take, as an example, a bill which I have introduced relative to something connected with the fisheries. If I want some information in a hurry on that bill I can telephone to Gloucester, and my constituents will be here in the morning. If, however, somebody from the far West wants some information in a hurry of that sort, he has got to send some tremendously long telegrams, at very high rates, and it seems to me, as the gentleman says, that not only the fact that the rates are higher is to be taken account of, but also the fact that a constituent in a far western State is unable to come to Washington.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer a substitute?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] offers a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $55,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid for personal or private telegrams hereafter sent, and that it is made the duty of the Clerk of the House to enforce this provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving a point of order, I ask that the Clerk report that again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SIMS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SIMS. I want to discuss this amendment for a moment only, if it is debatable.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman reserve his point of order or make it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will have the first right to make a statement.

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois make a point of order?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I make it.

Mr. EDWARDS. If the gentleman is going to make it, I will make it now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] to strike out the proviso.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken, I wish to say this: The committee was induced to report this provision based on information that came to it upon making inquiries as to the necessity of supplying a deficiency in this appropriation for the service of the House of Representatives. In making that inquiry we sent for the gentleman who was presumed to have the information about these items, more particularly than anybody else. The request was transmitted to the Committee on Appropriations by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. LLOYD], who indorsed the statement made by the Clerk of the House as to the necessity for these items. The officer under the Clerk of the House who is most intimately acquainted with the facts is the Chief Clerk of the House. The committee assumed, from the conference it had with the Chief Clerk, that not only was a reform desirable, but that he was acting in harmony with the Committee on Accounts in making the statements which were made before the Committee on Appropriations. If the Committee on Accounts are not in harmony with the Chief Clerk on this matter, then I am perfectly satisfied to have the Committee on Appropriations assume full responsibility for attempting to effect this reform.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman would not want to apply the reforms to men who do not abuse the privilege, would he?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have already said that an attempt was made to devise some method by which an abuse should be eliminated. The chairman of the Committee on Accounts admits that telegrams have been passed by that committee which, at least to the extent of 10 per cent, should not have been passed by the Committee on Accounts. It seems that the only method by which the reform can be accomplished is to prohibit the practice by law.

Mr. GARDNER of Masssachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to hold the floor until his five minutes have expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Every telegram that is in violation of a rule ought to be paid for by the man who sends it, but we ought not to prevent other men sending telegrams which should properly be paid for by the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let gentlemen pay for the telegrams they send. There is no more reason why we should pay for the telegrams they send than we should pay for every trip Members make away from Washington instead of getting mileage for one journey each session.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I do.

Mr. GARNER. I think the gentleman from New York has done the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] an injustice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no desire to do so.

Mr. GARNER. I know the gentleman has no desire to do him any injustice. The gentleman from Missouri did not say, or at least did not intend to say, I am sure, that the Committee on Accounts passed 10 per cent of telegrams that were not authorized under the rules permitting telegrams to be sent for the business of the Congress, but he did say that about 10 per cent of those that were sent were not on the business of the Congress, and he also said they were referred back to the Members and they were gladly paid for by the Members themselves.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information which came to the Committee on Appropriations was to the effect that the accounts were sent from the telegraph company, accompanied by the telegrams, and that the only thing done was to count up the number of words, to find out whether the amounts totaled were equal to the amounts to which they would be entitled at the rate multiplied by the number of words, and that no telegram was ever excluded; and the man who did the checking said that he had personally examined these telegrams, and that a number of them were paid for which under no pretense could possibly be construed as being sent on Government business.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired on this amendment.

Mr. GARNER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. That motion is not in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That would be an amendment to an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. MANN. That would be an amendment in the third degree. But I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas have five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take up the time of the House in the discussion of the merits of this amendment, but I do desire to make a statement to the House with reference to the law, as I understand it, applicable to the Committee on Accounts in dealing with these matters. I have no criticism to make of the Committee on Appropriations in bringing in this so-called reform, but I do undertake to criticize the Committee on Appropriations if it selects certain kinds of accounts and criticizes their allowance by the Committee on Accounts, while neglecting to take in other matters that I consider less justifiable than the sending of telegrams.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest to the gentleman that this is the only thing called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, the Chief Clerk of this House had no authority to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to this matter any more than any other. I want to pay the Chief Clerk the compliment of saying that, in my judgment, he is one of the best officers we have under the present organization, but I do know that in his diligence and zeal to protect the contingent fund of the House the Chief Clerk has come to the conclusion that there are a number of things that ought to be cut out which the Committee on Accounts, after careful consideration, have thought ought not to be cut out.

For instance the gentleman from New York will order a typewriter, and accept the action of the Committee on Accounts in authorizing it. Does he want the Committee on Accounts to turn down every order or requisition sent there not authorized by law? If he does, I am one to stick to the rule. I am an economist as well as the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I remember that the first time typewriters were furnished to Members of the House was in the furnishing of the House Office Building. Typewriters were purchased, not under my authority, for the House; and afterwards the Committee on Appropriations reported an item to supply deficiencies to provide typewriters for other Members as they were elected to the House. The matter was discussed and the appropriation was made with the understanding that it was to be used for the purchase of typewriters for Members of the House.

Mr. GARNER. I have no disposition to discuss the propriety of paying for typewriters, Mr. Speaker. I do want to call attention that you can go to the books of the Committee on Accounts, which are open to every Member, and ascertain what any other Member of the House has made a requisition for; and I know I stand in an impartial position, because I have made no requisition of any character through the Committee on Accounts for anything for my office, but I do say that a majority of the Members of this House have made requisitions for things that are not authorized by law. If you want your Committee on Accounts to turn them down, you ought to make a universal rule telling us not to authorize the payment for a single thing except that which is actually authorized by law.

We discussed this whole matter in the Committee on Accounts, and we came to the conclusion that after the contingent fund had been appropriated by the House that the Committee on Accounts was an appropriation committee itself so far as that fund was concerned, and where it authorized the payment of these bills, that made it law so far as that fund was concerned. Now, my only criticism in this matter is that it is absolutely impossible, physically impossible, for the Committee on Accounts to look over these bills and O. K. them, therefore the propriety of paying them must be left to the chairman of the committee—a greater burden and responsibility than any one Member should bear. We have prescribed certain rules, however, which enable the chairman and his clerk to act for the committee with some knowledge of their views. The committee has revised the rules during this session, which will materially reduce the expenditures coming out of the contingent fund.

We are trying to reduce expenses, and all we ask is that the Members help us by being economical themselves when making requisitions on this fund.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the proviso.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were 84 ayes and 51 noes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point that no quorum is present. It is evident that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 104, answered "present" 8, not voting 141, as follows:

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT). The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, as amended.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is the largest contingent fund that has ever been passed by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that debate is exhausted.

Mr. GILLETT. But, Mr. Speaker, there has been no debate on the amendment, I think. If there has been, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the Chair was not in the Chair at the time, but he has been advised at the desk that debate has been exhausted.

Mr. GILLETT. Then I move to strike out the last word. I simply wish to point out the fact that this is the largest contingent fund that has ever been used by the House, at least within 25 years, so far as our records show. The majority, the Democratic Party, started in on a record of economy, and it looks now as though they had concluded that it is only charity that begins at home, and economy can better be practiced on the departments and elsewhere, but not here at home. Of course the Appropriations Committee had to report this, because the authorizations have been made, the bills were coming in and had to be paid, but it is an unprecedentedly large amount.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that there was a deficiency in the appropriations for 1907 in this fund of $120,000?

Mr. GILLETT. But that is not as large as the contingent fund is this year.

Mr. BARTLETT. I know it.

Mr. GILLETT. That is what I stated. That is no contradiction.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is only about $20,000——

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, I have yielded to the gentleman for a question. I can not let him take up my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If I take up his time I will get him more.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, the majority as I say started in with the boast that they were going to reduce expenses in the House.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if he will refer to the record of the roll call just had, he will see that it was not so much by the vote of the Democratic Members of the House as by the vote of the Republican Members that this amendment prevailed.

Mr. GILLETT. How did the gentleman vote?

Mr. EDWARDS. I voted in the negative; I voted against it.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am not alluding now to the vote on the last amendment, although that side, being a majority, is responsible for the action of the House. It is always true, I suspect, it certainly was true in the last Congress that the minority was generally for large appropriations, but the majority is always responsible, and ought to be, and no matter how the individuals vote, the majority is now responsible for this tremendous contingent fund. At the beginning of Congress there were boasts that this House was going to be economical. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] brought in a resolution cutting down greatly the force employed by this House. I do not agree with some Members on this side who criticized it and said that it was taking away the conveniences of the House. I think he was right. There were abuses of patronage which ought to have been checked, but the trouble was that instead of applying a remedy to the disease they simply applied a palliative.

The reason that in this House we had this superfluous force of officials was because of the patronage system, and the only way to wipe out that abuse is to take away that patronage. If we had some civil service established; if we let the Civil Service Commission, or some committee, investigate and select permanent appointments it would affect the root of the trouble, but they have simply divided up the patronage as before—only taken less of it. I hope that they will be able to stand by their beginning, but it is my opinion, and this enormous contingent fund confirms it, that they will not be able to stand up against the pressure; and I believe, after election, after they have boasted from the stump of the economies they have produced, we will see that side come forward and gradually increase the officials and officers of this House. They had an opportunity to make a permanent cure, and they did not accept the opportunity.

They said at the time they were going to make the same extensive reductions in the departments that they did here. I knew it was impossible, because the same conditions do not prevail in the departments. If the departments were not under civil service I have no doubt they would have found the same condition of abuse there, because they are just as human as we are; but they are under civil service, and there was no motive for a superfluous force, and therefore, though they have had all these investigating committees on expenditures in operation which were expected, apparently, to produce great results, nothing has resulted. They have not been able to reduce the expenses in the departments as we have here, and this vast contingent fund, which has been spent largely by these committees, has mostly been wasted. I do not mean there are not abuses in the departments, that there are not abuses everywhere that can not be investigated, and some little good will be done by it; but, in my opinion, the great impressive feature of these investigations is not the economy they have produced but the money that they have cost.

It is very like the experience of Democratic economy in 1884. It was said then they expected after the Republicans had been in power for 24 years that the departments would unfold tremendous scandals and corruption, and in one department the head of the department, after the regular examining board had not been able to find any of these scandals, employed out of his own pocket a force of clerks to investigate the department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Just one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. I just wish to say that seems to have been followed here. They are making a tremendous amount of investigation of search for scandals and they are spending a vast amount of money, but they are not producing any results, the investigating committees are making no useful recommendations, and I believe that this unprecedentedly large contingent fund is just a forecast of the results that will come with the second session of this Congress and that all the Democratic claims for economy will be contradicted. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not disposed to criticize in reference to the amount to be added to the contingent fund, although I fully agree with what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has said regarding the investigations. When this Congress first met the House dispensed with a number of employees of the House. The gentlemen who came in control looked around and thought they saw supernumerary employees and that they could get along just as well without them, and they cut off a number. I have no criticism of the existing employees of the House. They came to their duties without great experience, at least in the House, and they are doing their work, and yet I think it is quite patent that there are not enough employees of the House at present to transact the business of the House. The other day I sent to the document room to get a copy of the bill which had passed the House, which had passed the Senate and then passed the House. The boy came back and said the document room had no copy except the original bill as originally introduced in the Senate. It had passed the Senate and passed the House. I sent again to the document room and told them I wanted a copy of the bill. The boy came back and told me the same thing. Then I went to the document room and asked for a copy of the bill and was told the same thing, but, having some knowledge of the ropes, I had to go elsewhere to get a copy of the bill as it passed the Senate.

The other day this House sent to the President of the United States for his signature an enrolled bill which had not passed. It was a bill which had passed the Senate, had passed the House, but gone into conference. Some gentleman connected with the House had retained the papers in his hands and had not turned them over to the conferees. The House conferees made a report, the House agreed to the conference report, and the Senate had not had possession of the papers, had had no conference report, had not agreed to one, and on the strength of what had been done, without having been agreed to by the Senate or House, the Committee on Enrolled Bills reported to the Speaker that the bill was duly enrolled, having passed both Houses, and the Speaker signed the bill. It went to the President, and had to be recalled by a resolution originating in the Senate. Now, I do not think that was a fault to be criticized on the part of the Clerk at the desk whose duty it was to turn the papers over to the conferees. The truth is the Journal Clerk of the House is worked to death. There is no man living who can properly attend to the duties of keeping track of what goes on in this House, and journalize it, during the rest of this session by himself.

That is one of the instances where a lack of employees might have sent an important bill to the President to be signed, because of niggardly and false economy. [Applause on the Republican side.] Originally it was undertaken through a mistaken idea and not through a mistaken motive.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Does the gentleman recall the fact that the very first bill which passed through this House in the Sixty-second Congress was a bill to correct a mistake of clerks in the Sixty-first Congress, by which several hundred thousands of dollars were appropriated which should not have been carried in the bill?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I recall the fact that a good many times since I have been a Member of the House, where appropriation bills are held up in conference until 15 or 20 minutes before the final adjournment, and they are compared in the enrolling room before they are agreed to, and otherwise would not become a law, the enrolling clerk does not sometimes put in or strike out an item as finally agreed to in conference. That is not the fault of the clerk. That is the fault of Congress, and so is this the fault of not providing the proper number of employees for the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All such errors are likely to occur in the House, no matter how competent the force is. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] called attention to what happened during the last Congress. That enrollment occurred under the most efficient enrolling clerk the House has ever known, with a force perfected during 16 years of control, and for the particular emergencies, due to the fact that Congress was working under pressure, additional assistants had been given to the Committee on Enrolled Bills. It is now so unfrequent a practice that it occasions great comment in this House to have engrossed bills lost between the time they leave one House and reach another.

Mr. MANN. It has been a frequent practice in this House, I am sure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and it happened a number of times in a Republican Congress. I was not sure in those Congresses whether a bill were lost or a messenger. We always replace the bill. The House has not suffered from any want of employees. It is possible that in some instances an additional employee here and there might have facilitated the transaction of business in some respects. The condition of which the gentleman complains in the document room is due very largely to the fact that Mr. Grayson, a Democrat, who has been continued there regardless of the political control of the House, is ill and away from his duties. He is one of the few men who possesses the peculiar information required in order to make the service of that office efficient.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I do not think the statement that I made was intended to criticize the document room. I do not think the evil was in the document room in that matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, the gentleman referred to the document room. I do not know what particular official or officer of the House he was attempting to criticize in giving reasons that perhaps the officials of the document room might not readily find documents sent for.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] criticizes the action of the Democratic House thus far, and calls attention to the fact that in 1884 the Democratic House started with the same tendency to investigate, and he states the efforts resulted in failure. I do not recall what happened in 1884, but if I were going into the past history of this Government, I might go back to 1876, when a Democratic House unearthed the frauds in the War Department, resulting in the impeachment of Secretary of War Belknap and the driving of many prominent Republicans into private life.

I do not know how effective or how efficient or how necessary many of the investigations ordered by the House have been. The House has authorized special committees appointed for specific purposes, or standing committees authorized to make particular investigations, to incur an expense of $163,000, all of which is charged to the contingent fund. These committees have expended thus far $66,932.45. The demands upon the contingent fund of the House are always uncertain. In 1908 the appropriations were $50,000, but a Republican Congress appropriated $120,000 to supply deficiencies in it, making a total of $170,000. In this appropriation the total for this fiscal year will be $180,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to give the figures of expenditures out of the contingent fund for the special investigating committees as something like $68,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Sixty-six thousand nine hundred and thirty-two dollars and forty-five cents.

Mr. MANN. I hold in my hand a communication from the Clerk of the House, which I received on the 29th of March, and at that time the amount of money paid out to these committees from the fund was $70,933.81.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I have a statement which I received from the Committee on Accounts, and I have found the total myself. It is possible that I have erred in casting the total.

Mr. MANN. It is quite possible that——

Mr. FITZGERALD. But with the permission of the House, I shall put into the RECORD a statement showing the expenditures of all the committees of the House from July 1, 1911, to May 20, 1912.

Mr. MANN. I say it is quite possible, then, that the gentleman refers only to payments out of the contingent fund for this fiscal year. I presume my statement included payments for both fiscal years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is possible. The statement I make is from July 1, 1911.

Mr. GILLETT. And the gentleman is assuming that no further payments will be necessary from the contingent fund. I think that is not a safe assumption.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not assuming any such thing as that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This item includes $25,000 to meet the demands of these special committees between now and the 1st of July. I am unable to forecast whether additional sums will be needed.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] states that this House at the outset asserted that it would accomplish the same reforms in the various departments of the Government that is accomplished here; that the conditions existing in the departments were such as would permit the reduction of expenditures on the same scale as in the House, and that it has not lived up to its promises. The committee has found such conditions, and it has recommended such reductions, against the protest of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

In the first place, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill carries a provision which prohibits the filling of any vacancy in the classified service in the District of Columbia during the coming fiscal year. The committee reported the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, carrying $2,600,000 below the appropriations for the current year, which were in the neighborhood of $36,000,000. In addition it required the War Department arbitrarily to reduce by 10 per cent the clerical force in that department, and with these reductions and with the reductions enforced and with the prohibition against reappointments, the total saving, if we had the cooperation of the Republican administration and the Republican Members in both branches of the Federal Legislature, would be between four and five million dollars below the appropriation for the current year, or a reduction in the neighborhood of 10 per cent in the cost of conducting these branches of the Government. I had hoped to receive the assistance of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], and I do not despair. We dropped out of the State Department officials appointed under a pretended organization without any authority of law. Money obtained for one purpose was applied to an entirely different purpose. The gentleman from Massachusetts protested against our action, and the State Department is busy using its official force, not in conducting the official business of the Government, but in sending out literature to all the manufacturing establishments of the United States and to the boards of trade and chambers of commerce, protesting against what one of its officials has had the presumption to say is reactionary legislation, legislation that would wreck the State Department, and unless abandoned two of the high officials threaten to resign.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that if these officials were to resign on July 1, they would only be anticipating by a few months an event that is bound to occur; and if these distinguished gentlemen can not conduct the State Department with the same organization that existed until they incorporated into it a number of officials out of an appropriation given for the purpose of enabling the President to carry out the maximum and minimum provision of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill it would be better that we return to the days of John Hay and ELIHU ROOT, who were able satisfactorily to conduct the Department of State, at least satisfactorily to the people of the United States, without engrafting upon it a number of new officials unknown to the law, whose official existence can not be justified, as far as I have been able to ascertain, for any legitimate reason whatever.

We may not succeed in accomplishing all the reforms we desire. We will not if we have to rely upon the assistance of those representing the administration in both Houses of Congress, but we will do our best. We will recommend reforms whenever the necessity exists and the facts justify, and when this Congress is ended, so far as I am concerned, I shall be content to rest upon the record that has been made by the Democratic House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from New York desire unanimous consent to insert some paper in the RECORD?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement which shows the expenditures for the various committees of the House from the contingent fund from July 1, 1911, to May 20, 1912.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert certain statements in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] as amended.

The question being taken, the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery for Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates from Territories, and Resident Commissioners, and for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $1,000.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York what portion of this $1,000 is to be used for the purpose of paying the yearly allowance of new Members, or is it for committees entirely?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Committees and officers of the House.

Mr. GARNER. None of it is to be used for the Members' annual allowance of $125?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all, as I understand it. The chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. LLOYD] transmitted a statement prepared by the Chief Clerk of the House, in which it was stated that it was essential to have $1,000 for the stationery account. The Chief Clerk stated that it was for the purpose of supplying stationery for committees and officers of the House.

Mr. MANN. I think it is fair to state that there are three new Members of the House, who are entitled to their allowance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They will be taken care of in the general deficiency bill, if there is any such item.

Mr. MANN. I think it comes out of this item. I suppose it has already been paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They would be payable out of this fund.

Mr. MANN. They have already been paid, which helps to shorten this fund.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be. I am not certain whether they have been paid.

Mr. GARNER. Can the gentleman tell us what proportion of this $1,000 is to be used by the officers of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chief Clerk addressed this communication to the Committee on Accounts, under date of May 9, 1912:

I call your attention to the fact that our fund of $5,000, out of which we provide stationery for officers and committees of the House, is exhausted, and we request that you secure an appropriation of $1,000 to replenish this fund for the months of April, May, and June of the present fiscal year.

Yours, respectfully, J. C. SOUTH, Chief Clerk.

The chairman of the Committee on Accounts transmitted that estimate and request to the Committee on Appropriations, I suppose by authority of the Committee on Accounts. My recollection is that the statement of the Chief Clerk before the Committtee on Appropriations was to the effect that this was to supply stationery for committees and officers, without indicating the proportion.

Mr. GARNER. Then the gentleman does not know how much shortage exists by virtue of the use of stationery by committees or officers of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of such miscellaneous expenses as may be authorized by the Attorney General, for the United States courts and their officers, $50,000: Provided, That in so far as it may be deemed necessary by the Attorney General, this appropriation shall be available for such expenses in the District of Alaska.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement containing certain quotations relating to appropriations for the Department of Justice, in connection with the enforcement of what is known as the antitrust law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] moves to strike out the last word, and asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

PROSECUTION OF THE TRUSTS.

On December 17, 1902, when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was before the House and the item making appropriations for the Department of Justice had been read, Mr. BARTLETT offered the following amendment:

"For the purpose of enforcing the antitrust laws of the United States and to enable the Attorney General of the United States to prosecute suits and legal proceedings against persons or corporations who shall violate the antitrust laws of the United States now in force, or that may hereafter be enacted, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may, in the judgment of the Attorney General, be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General, and he is hereby directed to proceed against any and all persons or corporations who may have violated or may violate any of the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States." (Vol. 36, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 411.)

Mr. Bingham, in charge of the bill, said:

"I will make no point of order against that proposition."

Mr. Overstreet said:

"There is no such law known to the statutes as the antitrust law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD said:

"I understand that the disposition here is not to create a new statute, but to provide the Attorney General with the necessary funds by which he can enforce the law now on the statute books."

Mr. Hepburn offered the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. BARTLETT:

"That for the enforcement of the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890, and sections 73, 74, 75, and 76 of the act entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' approved August 27, 1894, the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not heretofore appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General in the employment of special counsel and agents of the Department of Justice to conduct proceedings, suits, and prosecutions under said acts in the courts of the United States: Provided, That no person shall be prosecuted or be subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in any proceeding, suit, or prosecution under said acts: Provided further, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution or punishment for perjury committed in so testifying." (P. 412.)

Mr. CANNON said:

"But the gentleman from Georgia moved his amendment; no point of order was made upon it—the point, I think, being properly withheld—and that proposition is now before us for consideration. For one I am quite willing to settle it here, so far as we can, and would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he increase the sum from $250,000, as proposed in the substitute he moves, to $500,000, and that he make the appropriation immediately available."

Mr. Hepburn accepted these suggestions, and his substitute was amended accordingly.

Mr. BARTLETT said:

"The committee of which the gentleman from Indiana [Overstreet] is a distinguished and honored member has not for a number of years reported any bill or done anything else to relieve the country from the exactions of the trusts, not even when the President of the United States, in his message of December of last year as well as the one delivered to the House at the beginning of the present session, has recommended that some resolute and practical legislation should be enacted to correct the evil of the trusts. And I say that the gentleman does not stand in a position to complain when other Members of the House see fit to propose that funds be put at the disposal of the Attorney General with which to prosecute the trusts of this country. * * * I offered this because it did not appear that any member of the majority intended to do anything to aid the Attorney General or do anything toward prosecuting the trusts of this country or to carry out the recommendation of the President."

Further on he said:

"The Republican Party has been masquerading sufficiently before the country on the subject of their opposition to the trusts, and for one I want to put this amendment before the House, that it may be voted on."

Mr. UNDERWOOD said:

"In fact, he [Grosvenor] points with pride to one or two cases where the Republican Party has actually used the law on the statute books to suppress certain trusts that it was not in partnership with, but I want to ask him, if the law that he takes so much pride in, the law that he says is effective and can suppress trusts, is on the statute books, Why has not the Republican Party, which has been in power since 1896 and which has had absolute control of the legislative and executive branches of this Government since 1896, suppressed the trusts? I would ask him, Why, since the Republican Party has had complete control of the Executive—the President, the Attorney General, and Congress, with the power to provide money—it has not suppressed the trusts? Enumerate in your own mind and before the people the trusts that are a living menace to the people to-day, and yet, according to the confessions of your own leader, you have had the law in your hands and have had the power and the ability to suppress those trusts since 1896 and have not done it.

"Now, I congratulate the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that when this side of the House offers an amendment to this bill to aid the Attorney General and the Executive of this great Government to enforce the law against the trusts they had the manhood to stand up for the masses of the common people of this country; that they have had the manhood and the courage, notwithstanding the political line, to come across and accept the proposition we made and aid us in the enactment of this legislation, which will do something toward suppressing the evils the people are crying against."

The substitute was then adopted and the amendment as amended by the substitute adopted without division. (Vol. 36, p. 419.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY OF THE NAVY.

Pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty and other duty; officers on waiting orders; officers on the retired list; clerks to paymasters at yards and stations, general storekeepers ashore and afloat, and receiving ships and other vessels; 2 clerks to general inspectors of the Pay Corps; 1 clerk to pay officer in charge of deserters' rolls; not exceeding 10 clerks to accounting officers at yards and stations; commutation of quarters for officers on shore not occupying public quarters, including boatswains, gunners, carpenters, sailmakers, machinists, pharmacists, and mates, naval constructors and assistant naval constructors; and also members of Nurse Corps (female); for hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them, or commutation of quarters not to exceed the amount which an officer would receive were he not serving with troops; pay of enlisted men on the retired list; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge; interest on deposits by men; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice seamen, including men in the engineers' force and men detailed for duty with Naval Militia, and for the Fish Commission, 48,000 men; and the number of enlisted men shall be exclusive of those undergoing imprisonment with sentence of dishonorable discharge from the service at expiration of such confinement; and as many machinists as the President may from time to time deem necessary to appoint, not to exceed 20 in any one year; and 3,500 apprentice seamen under training at training stations and on board training ships, at the pay prescribed by law; pay of the Nurse Corps; rent of quarters for members of the Nurse Corps; $37,280,971.25.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition to submit a request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and print an address by Mayor Gaynor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a recent address by Mayor Gaynor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Upon what subject?

Mr. SIMS. It is upon a subject upon which Mayor Gaynor is well qualified to speak, having been a judge.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will agree that the address shall not be put in the current proceedings, but in the latter part of the RECORD, I shall not object.

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection to that. The article is too good to lose.

Mr. MANN. I do not know of any place where it is more effectually lost than to put it in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

[The article referred to will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 2, line 17, by inserting the amendment I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "list," insert the following: "Except that no part of this appropriation shall be paid to officers retired from service after July 1, 1912, as provided in section 9 of the personnel act, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, approved March 3, 1899, known as the involuntary retirement or plucking-board retirement.

Mr. PADGETT. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I would like to know what the gentleman's point of order is?

Mr. PADGETT. It is legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve his point of order or make it?

Mr. PADGETT. I will make the point of order, unless the gentleman from Georgia wishes to be heard.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I do wish to be heard, Mr. Chairman. The object of this amendment is to reach a number of naval officers that are retired year by year by what is known as the plucking board—men who are competent, men against whom there is no breath of suspicion that they are not capable, men trained by the Government at the people's expense who have served 12 years are retired by this board over their protest. If there is a man on the floor of the House to-day who denies the proposition, I am going to invite him to get up and deny it right now or forever hereafter hold his peace, that officers are retired for no other purpose than for the purpose of making a place for other officers. Now rise and deny that statement.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Certainly.

Mr. KOPP. As I understand, the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to prohibit any part of the appropriation going to these officers?

Mr. TRIBBLE. To those officers plucked by the plucking board.

Mr. KOPP. If they have been plucked unfairly, does the gentleman think that it is right to cut them out from all pay?

Mr. TRIBBLE. This provides that after July 1, 1912. It is not retroactive, it does not go into the past, but is for the future.

Mr. KOPP. It applies to any future plucking.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my friend from Georgia that I agree with him about the plucking board, and I hope it will be repealed; but does not the gentleman believe that if his amendment were adopted, that after July 1 next the plucking board would continue to operate and that men would be retired and would not be paid?

Mr. TRIBBLE. That is a legitimate question and I am glad the gentleman from Illinois asked it. I expected such a question to be asked. I have provided an amendment which I shall offer at the proper time to repeal the plucking board.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but we are discussing now the point of order to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. TRIBBLE. It is true that if my amendment were adopted, and this act were not repealed, it would work an injustice to these men who hereafter might be plucked, if the plucking board still remained on the statute books.

Mr. MANN. We shall have to assume as far as this amendment is concerned that the plucking board still remains on the statute books. Would not the gentleman's amendment in effect change the law, and direct the plucking board not to retire anybody, because could it be conceived that Congress would provide that men should be retired and then provide that they should not be paid?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes; that is a good suggestion, and the gentleman is in line with my views. Probably I have not been able to express them as clearly as he has expressed them for me.

Mr. MANN. But I am not in line with the gentleman's idea about the point of order.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, in answer to my friend and colleague on the committee, I have prepared an amendment which I will introduce at the proper time to repeal the plucking board. Some gentleman will rise on the floor of this House and ask why I did not introduce a bill to that effect and have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I will answer that and I am free to answer it. The only hope I had to get it through this House was to come into the House and ask this House to join me in this fight on the plucking board, because I could not put through the Committee on Naval Affairs a recommendation to repeal the plucking board. That is why I am here at this moment.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. As a member of the committee, I should like to have the gentleman state the basis of his statement—whether he has tried to get any such measure through the committee?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I have drawn no bill.

Mr. HOBSON. And if he had tried to get it through the committee, would that have prevented his trying to get it adopted on the floor of the House?

Mr. TRIBBLE. It would not. I have drawn no bill, but I have felt sentiment of the committee, and I know what it is. Is not the gentleman opposed to it? Would he vote to abolish the plucking board?

Mr. HOBSON. No; but——

Mr. TRIBBLE. Then why should you speak up? You belong to the opposition. Let the fellows who are in favor of abolishing the plucking board, and who would stand with me in this fight in the Committee on Naval Affairs, get up and speak. You are opposing me and should keep your seat [laughter], as I only requested those who would support such a bill in the committee to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman undertook to discuss the point of order. The point of order was made, and not reserved, as I understood it.

Mr. PADGETT. I said that I would withhold it until the gentleman made his statement.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, this is a limitation on an appropriation. It reduces the appropriation, not by hundreds, not by thousands, but by many thousands. It is a reduction in the appropriation, and in saying that I think it is all that is necessary to say on the question of the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, the plucking board, it is admitted in the hearings, takes from the service men who object to being taken from the service. Men who are in the Navy who have heard of my fight on the plucking board have come to me and said that they hoped that this amendment which I propose to offer would be passed, that they could not afford to allow their names to be used, but they say in effect, "I am in the service and I want to stay in the service; I do not want to be thrown out into the world after I have entered the Navy expecting to stay there during certainly the better part of my young manhood; I do not want to go out and pass among my fellow men and have every man who knows about my retirement point his finger at me and say that something must be the matter with me as I have been retired from the Navy."

It is admitted by officers, every one who testified, that some of the very best men are retired under this plucking-board system, and for what purpose? It is for the purpose of making place for others, no other reason can be assigned. Mr. Chairman, is it right to put upon the backs of the American people the expense of a retired officer, who is capable, competent, and tried in every respect, and to make the American people pay from three to six thousand dollars a year to that retired officer doing nothing but wandering around the streets, who wants to be in the service and who can not be in the service on account of the plucking board?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the gentleman if he ever knew an incompetent or relatively unfit person anywhere who wanted to be removed or retired?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I know some competents who do not want to be removed, who have protested that they may be removed if this board continues to exist.

Mr. WEEKS. Who does the gentleman think is the best judge of the competency of officers—officers who have served with them or a Member of Congress?

Mr. TRIBBLE. On questions touching the personnel of the Navy, where the official force of the Navy is interested, I prefer to give my constituents my own judgment and not the judgment of naval experts on measures touching the pay of officers. They are the recipients of the pay bills and our constituents furnish the bone and sinew that produces the money to pay all this naval expense. That is the only judgment I can accord to them on this question.

Mr. WEEKS. Does not the gentleman know that in all cases these plucking boards are made up of senior officers, frequently officers who have been retired or about to be retired, and such action as they take can make no possible difference in their pay?

Mr. TRIBBLE. It makes no difference to me. I say to you they have no right to pluck anybody. Nobody should be retired who is capable and competent. The United States Government, in the first place, has taken out of the pockets of the people $18,000 to graduate a man at the Naval Academy, and they then pay a big salary, say, for 12 years, to a man who is a competent man, and then this plucking board comes along for the purpose of making a place for some other fellow and plucks him.

I am not in accord with the committee on many items in this bill. I protested in the committee, and gave notice that I would carry the fight to the floor of the House. You have heard the claim that we have not got sufficient officers; apologies are offered to this House for the lack of that spirit of economy naturally expected of this committee—increasing the appropriations over last year nearly $3,000,000, and an increase of pay of officers and an increase of 4,000 enlisted men and officers are referred to here and in the report. That is exactly what we are trying to keep them from doing. Why do they want to provide more officers; why is there a deficiency in the Navy? Because the plucking board, forsooth, has taken competent men and retired them on salaries for the purpose of making places for officers to take the places of these men who are being retired, who are capable, competent men.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman answer one more question? Can the gentleman furnish the committee with a list of the competent men who have been so retired—and I refer to competency only in a relative way?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes, sir; if you look in the back of the book, you will get the names of those who have been retired by the plucking board. I will challenge you to pick out one incompetent who has been retired by the plucking board. I will furnish you with a list of those who have been retired——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman read the report recently submitted to the House by the Committee on Naval Affairs proposing a change in the law about the plucking board?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I have seen no change in that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Naval Affairs the other day reported into the House a bill proposing to change the law in reference to the plucking board. Has the gentleman had the good fortune or the misfortune to read that report?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I happened to get one of those reports yesterday.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has read that report he should hand it to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], because if there ever was an excoriation of the plucking board in the most denunciatory language, almost vituperative, it is that report of the Committee on Naval Affairs submitted to the House the other day.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will say to the gentleman, who is always fair to me and seems always fair to this House—I will give him credit for that—my answer is I do not want so much excoriation from the committee and so much talk about economy from the committee, but more action. Practice economy instead of excoriations.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to say to the gentleman that I have read the report to which the gentleman from Illinois refers, and I do not agree with its conclusion. At the proper time I shall have some remarks to make on that subject, but it seems to me the gentleman from Georgia, being a member of the committee, should have been familiar with this action; he should know the committee, as far as it can, has taken action.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Here is the only one change the committee has made, which I think is the change to which the gentleman from Illinois referred, and that is where a man is retired he shall be retired in the rank and grade which he holds and not be promoted. Heretofore when the plucking board retired an officer he was not getting enough salary, but they retired him in the rank above so the American people could pay him a salary of a rank in which he never served a day.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman speaks about the plucking board plucking a man and then retiring him at the grade higher up. Now, in the case where the plucking board does retire a man, does not the gentleman think, as a matter of right, that a man involuntarily retired from the service he loved and in which he has spent his life should have some consideration and be promoted a grade higher?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Certainly. Heretofore he has not even had a hearing. The plucking board walks along, and if Mr. Howard happens to be an officer in the Navy, they pick him out. They do not even give him a hearing. I never heard of a board in the United States, or any State, or anywhere else, that would not give a man an opportunity to make a defense. They would not even give him that chance. I am glad the gentleman brought out that proposition.

Mr. HOWARD. A gentleman says the acts on the part of the plucking board are a star-chamber proceeding, and did not give a man a hearing or any show at all.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will say if there is anything in the books that describes a star-chamber proceeding, you have it in the plucking board.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this House, which at the beginning of this session reduced the pay of men all around here that were getting small salaries—to say the least of it, certainly not large salaries—for the purpose of economy, and cut off $185,000 of pay, will now carry on the program of economy and join me in a fight for real economy.

Now, I am offering to this House this simple proposition. Men in the Navy are serving their country in the profession which they selected in their youth. They are there, capable and competent and tried. I am arguing that this House allow them to stay in that Navy and save the expense of paying retired salaries and salaries to new men to take their place, that the people may not have to bear this extra pay year by year out of their hard-earned money.

This is not a political question. It is a question that should appeal to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] over there, who is usually right and I think wants to do the right thing, as well as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], on questions of economy on that side of the House, as well as on this side.

And I now appeal to this side of the House, practicing economy, to stand for economy—real economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the question before the House is a very simple one. Everybody recognizes that in an organization such as the Navy or the Army there must be promotion, and it is well known that the death rate is not equal to affording the promotion necessary to secure efficient and even simple-handed right and justice to the men who enter the Army and the Navy; therefore there must be some method resorted to to secure an elimination of inefficiency and age of retirement, so that the boys who enter the service can have some hope and some expectation of having a career and an opportunity of accomplishing some service. That is accomplished by the retirement method, and one phase of the retirement is the plucking board.

Now, it is not the question before the committee as to whether or not the plucking board shall continue. The question the gentleman is submitting is that the officers who are retired under existing law, a law that has existed for many years, and a policy that is coexistent with the Army and Navy, shall be retired, but the money appropriated shall not be paid to them. That is the justice of the proposition that he is submitting. I do not think it needs any discussion.

I shall ask the Chair to rule upon the point of order, and if the point of order is overruled, then I shall ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the proposed amendment is a limitation on the appropriation, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Then I ask for a vote.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would not say anything at this time had not the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] mentioned my name in connection with his proposition. I will never cast a vote in this House against the interests of the American Navy. I admire the personnel of the Navy, and I am proud to represent a constituency which believes in it. Its officers and men are the best on the face of the earth, and they deserve the support and the encouragement of every Member of Congress. I do not believe in foolish or unwise economy when it comes to the American Navy. Neither do I believe in the unjust criticisms that have been aimed here to-day at the officers of that great fighting force of our Republic. There is not in all of our population a higher or a better or a nobler class of citizens than the officers and the men who constitute our Navy, and I repudiate the insinuation that these men are only seeking to put their hands into the pockets of the people and working selfishly to gain advantage in reference to their retirement.

Mr. TRIBBLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Directly. I do not believe that the people of Georgia will countenance anything that reflects upon the Navy. I do not believe that the American people, and especially the people of the South, will indorse any movement looking to the curtailment or the reduction of the rank or the pay of the men in the Navy. Who has added imperishable fame and glory to the American flag? Not only the Army, but the Navy. And where is there an American citizen, lover of his country, who does not feel proud of the achievements of our Navy? John Paul Jones, Perry, Decatur, Farragut, a native of my own county, Dewey, Schley, and our splendid colleague from Alabama, Capt. HOBSON [applause], are good examples of its glorious ornaments.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] well said that there is no politics in our Navy and legislation in its interest.

Thank heaven there is no politics in it; nothing but patriotism; which should fill the hearts of every Member of this House. I propose to stand in the main by this committee, except in the matter of increasing the number of battleships and certain new legislative features. We have at the head of this committee a broad, patriotic Member of this House, my colleague [Mr. PADGETT] from Tennessee [applause], anxious for the welfare and success and devoted to the best interests of the American seamen and the American Navy, and it will be my pleasure to stand here and aid in holding up his hands, as far as I can consistently do so, in the discharge of his duties as chairman of that committee.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I want to ask the gentleman if he was here yesterday and heard the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the gentleman has referred, state that this plucking board was for the purpose of plucking out one officer to make place for another?

Mr. AUSTIN. I believe the men constituting the so-called plucking board, the sworn officers of the Navy—men who have spent their lives in the service—have nothing in view except the best interests of the service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not care to take more time.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LITTLEPAGE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5930) to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16661) to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians under or by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on March 24, 1832.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 20840. An act to provide for deficiencies in the fund for police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 72. Joint resolution making provision for the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations;

S. 139. An act authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

S. 473. An act relating to Navy retirements.

The message also announced that the President having returned to the Senate, in compliance with Senate concurrent resolution 21, the bill (H. R. 14083) to create a new division of the southern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Corpus Christi, Tex., and for a clerk of said court, and for other purposes, and the Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate having canceled his signature to said bill, the Secretary of the Senate is directed to return said bill to the House of Representatives for the cancellation of the Speaker's signature.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The grades of the active list of the Pay Corps of the Navy are hereby increased by 10 additional paymasters, in all 86 paymasters, and by 20 additional passed assistant and assistant paymasters, in all 116 passed assistant and assistant paymasters: Provided, That the total increase of the Pay Corps of the Navy shall not exceed 20 during the first fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question as to why it was necessary to make the increase provided for in the first two lines of this paragraph. In other words, it reads, "The grades of the active list of the Pay Corps of the Navy."

Mr. PADGETT. I will state to the gentleman that the grades of the active list of the Pay Corps have not been increased for many years. The last increase was when the appropriations of the Navy were about $80,000,000. They are now from $120,000,000 to $130,000,000 a year. The chief of the bureau for years has been recommending—and so has the department—that there should be an increase, stating that the duties have become so much enlarged, the character of the ships has become so different, and the responsibilities have grown to be so much more onerous, that the Surgeon General of the Navy has informed the department that many of the existing members of the Pay Corps are being broken down in health and put on the retired list by the excess of their duties and the heavy burdens placed upon them.

Mr. CULLOP. Then, commencing on line 11, "and by 20 additional passed assistant and assistant paymasters, in all 116 passed assistant and assistant paymasters."

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. There is an increase of 20 in that. Why is that?

Mr. PADGETT. That is the same class and for the same purpose, except one is a clerk of a higher grade than the other. There are 10 of the higher grade and 20 of the subordinate grade.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman sees fit to do it, before the Chair rules on it I desire very earnestly to address the Chair, because I admit that it is subject to a point of order. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. I stated that it was subject to a point of order, but I want to call the Chairman's attention to the fact that before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] made the point of order there was debate upon it by the gentleman, with his interrogations addressed to myself for information, without reserving a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] had reserved a point of order.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman from Illinois reserved a point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Then, I concede that it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. CULLOP. I make the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Before the Chair rules upon it, I want to state to the gentleman that this is a very important matter. It is very essential to the proper conduct and expenditure of money and the purchase of provisions, because these pay clerks are charged with the duty of quartermasters. They perform the duties of the commissary. They perform the duties of the pay clerk, and all of these duties have multiplied many times since their number was established, until they have become so onerous that it is to-day a serious matter, so much so that the Surgeon General of the Navy has officially certified to the department, and it has been transmitted to us, that the members of the Pay Corps are being broken down in health because their number is insufficient and their duties overburden them. I submit this appeal to the gentlemen in all fairness to these men, that we ought to have this increase which has been sought for years by the department.

Mr. CULLOP. I suggest to the gentleman that we may very well try it just one more year.

Mr. PADGETT. That is the same suggestion that has been going on for years.

Mr. CULLOP. Very possibly some better solution for the problem can be found than this large increase in the number.

Mr. PADGETT. These men have got to do the work, and their number is not sufficient.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this debate is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I object.

Mr. HOWARD. Consent has already been given.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no objection at the time the Chair put the request.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. How many paymasters are there in the Navy now?

Mr. PADGETT. The number is stated in the section. There are 86 paymasters now, and it is proposed to increase that number by 10, and to increase the number of passed assistant and assistant paymasters by 20, making the total 116.

Mr. HOWARD. As I understand the statement made a moment ago, the Navy Department is now paying out nearly twice as much money as it did when this number was established.

Mr. PADGETT. It is the difference between $81,000,000 and $126,000,000. A few years ago the amount was $138,000,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Do these assistant paymasters have anything to do with the auditing of the accounts rendered to the Navy Department?

Mr. PADGETT. No; not at the department here, as I understand. They come to the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts here, and are audited in the department.

Mr. HOWARD. What are the specific duties of these paymasters and assistant paymasters?

Mr. PADGETT. The assistant paymasters are on ships——

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, under what rule is the debate now proceeding?

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent.

Mr. PADGETT. The paymasters and assistant paymasters are on board ship. They attend to the disbursement of money on shipboard, and also act as quartermasters and commissaries. They purchase and distribute the food, inspect it, and pay the accounts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Auditor for the Navy Department is directed to allow payments made to hospital stewards who were granted permanent appointments as of date of May 13, 1908, which have heretofore been disallowed by reason of a decision of the Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury dated December 29, 1910, and to pay them out of the appropriations for "Pay of the Navy."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] makes the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to proceed for five minutes by unanimous consent before the Chair rules on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia objects. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] briefly on the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be entirely frank with the Chair. It occurs to me that this is subject to a point of order. In making that statement I want to say that the Naval Committee, looking at the welfare of the Navy and the preservation——

Mr. TRIBBLE. I make the point order that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the point of order, and I object to his statement. He has admitted that my point of order is good.

Mr. PADGETT. This is a question for the Chair. I am addressing the Chair by sufferance of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. If objection is made, the gentleman from Tennessee will be required to confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. I am speaking on the point of order. I say that the Naval Committee placed this provision in the bill to take care of the lives and preserve the health of the men in the Navy.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the point of order. The gentleman has admitted that the point of order is good, and therefore he has no right to the floor except to discuss the point of order, which he is not doing, but is explaining why the Naval Committee reports it.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that if the gentleman from Georgia is unwilling to take care of the health of the sick men in the Navy I can not help it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after line 23, strike out the period and add the following: "And in apportioning the pay under this act no Navy pay shall be construed under any act as less than Army pay for like conditions and grades where the officers concerned have had creditable Civil War service."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to reserve a point of order and then ask a question. Did the Chair rule that the point of order was well taken on the second paragraph, lines 16 to 23?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so ruled.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I submit that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama has no place here.

Mr. HOBSON. If the gentleman will reserve his point of order I will say that, irrespective of the merits of the case, I think it is subject to a point of order; but, before the gentleman makes the point of order, or while he is deciding to make it, I want to state that this simply removes one of the inequalities that happens to have been the result of the recent laws in carrying out the spirit of equalizing the pay between the Army and the Navy. It has been largely straightened out in both services except in this particular. There are seven old officers who served in the Civil War and happened to be on the retired list and failed to get the benefit of legislation equalizing the pay of the Army and Navy. The expense involved is very small. It is in the interest of these seven old men to carry out the spirit of the law that this House has enacted.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman ever know where an attempt was made to equalize downward?

Mr. HOBSON. I do not believe I ever did. But it is in the interest of these old men who served in the Civil War and are being discriminated against, not in line with but contrary to the spirit of the acts of Congress.

Mr. MANN. How much more do these men now receive on the retired list than officers who are in the Army—who are not out of the Army—and never were on the retired list?

Mr. HOBSON. It is difficult to say, but if we keep on increasing the pensions it would be better for a man never to have stayed in the service.

Mr. MANN. The highest pension that we have allowed any man is $30 a month at the age of 75. Now, how much do these officers get now on the retired list?

Mr. HOBSON. It depends upon what their rank is.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has named seven officers and he knows what their rank is.

Mr. HOBSON. I can tell the gentleman what the increased pay will amount to.

Mr. MANN. No; but what do they get?

Mr. HOBSON. It differs in each case.

Mr. MANN. What does the lowest one get?

Mr. HOBSON. The difference between two-thirds and three-quarters pay would be $875.

Mr. MANN. And the difference is more than twice as much as some officers would receive under the pension laws if they were not on the retired list.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman from Illinois recognizes that this is not analogous with pensions. These officers served in the line and other branches of the Navy long years after the war and are entirely within the category of retired officers.

Mr. MANN. They are in the category of retired officers, but do not wish to remain in the category of other retired officers, but want special favors.

Mr. HOBSON. On the contrary, the purpose is to put them on the basis with other retired officers and equalize their pay.

Mr. MANN. On the basis of some other retired officers who have received special favors.

Mr. HOBSON. No; but those that come under the operation of the general law, to equalize the pay between the Army and the Navy, which has been accepted as a fundamental principle.

Mr. MANN. We do not accept the proposition as a fundamental principle that every time we increase the pay of a man under a special act you have by general law to increase the pay of everybody; that is what the gentleman's proposition amounts to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all officers of the Navy who, since the 3d day of March, 1899, have been advanced or may hereafter be advanced in grade or rank pursuant to law shall be allowed the pay and allowances of the higher grade or rank from the dates stated in their commissions.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter any officer retired under the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of the act approved March 3, 1899, an act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States, shall be retired with the rank and three-fourths the sea pay of the grade from which he is retired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This brings us back to the proposition that I had before the House a short time since. This is in line with the argument I made before the House. The committee has conceded part of the argument I made by offering this paragraph to this bill, and I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] will not insist upon the point of order, because it will save the Treasury of the United States several thousand dollars to allow this to become a law. In other words, it allows the men who are being retired by the plucking board to be retired in the grade in which they are serving. Heretofore they have been retired in the grade to which they have been promoted for the purpose of retirement. The plucking board promoted them and then gave them a better salary. In other words, they plucked them and then gave them a reward for plucking them. I say to the gentlemen here on the floor that it is very poor argument to stand up here and say that these are inefficient men who have been plucked. Yet on the statute books by their own acts they offer a reward for incompetency by promoting before so plucking them. As a matter of fact, these men are not incompetent; and while I am on the floor I desire to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] that I yield to no man in my loyalty for the Navy. Where is the man whose heart did not throb with admiration and pride when Admiral Dewey pushed his gunboats into Manila Bay and thrust aside those great German war vessels that lay there watching him, growling like dogs, almost roaring like lions, waiting for an opportunity to pounce upon him, but they dare not touch the flag he bore. I am standing for the Navy—a fighting Navy, an effective Navy, a sea Navy and not a land Navy. This bill carries too much money, and nothing to show for it.

That is why I am complaining. I am complaining about the inefficiency of the Navy. I am complaining about the expenses on the land. How well we all remember when the Oregon, then the leviathan of the sea, moved out of San Francisco Harbor, her great smokestacks puffing and her propellers moving her faster and faster to the scene of action of the Spanish-American War. Even little school boys and girls watched her movements with patriotic pride as she moved around the coast of South America into the Atlantic Ocean, and when she rushed into the strife and sent those Spanish vessels to the bottom of the sea even the women of the country shouted with joy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I make these remarks in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], and I repeat that I yield to no man in my loyalty to the efficiency of the Navy. I have not advocated battleships at this time, but I do advocate a seagoing Navy, and not an expensive land substitute.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to this paragraph, and that is why I reserved the point of order. Is this an increase either in pay or rank of any of the retired officers?

Mr. PADGETT. It is a decrease both in rank and in pay.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to a point of order. It comes clearly within the rule respecting legislation that provides for economy. It reduces the rank and the pay and is not subject to a point of order. The old law provides that upon retirement they shall be promoted to the next higher grade and paid at the higher rate. This provides that they shall be retired in the grade without promotion and at a lower grade of pay, so that it is not subject to the point of order. Before I conclude my remarks I must be permitted to say that I felt a very deep thrill of emotion as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] so eloquently, so tenderly, and so pathetically referred to the glory of the Navy and to the brilliancy of the victories at Manila Bay, Santiago, and other places. At the same time I find some difficulty in reconciling his great enthusiasm and admiration of those events and his performance here to-day of refusing the opportunity of providing nurses to take care of the sick men and the wounded. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that it is not subject to the point of order. The personnel bill was passed March 3, 1899, and I may say that I had charge of the measure on the floor of this House. It provided for retirement, voluntary and involuntary, of officers with the rank and pay of the next higher grade. This proposition proposes to retire officers under sections 8 and 9 of the personnel bill for voluntary and involuntary retirement with the rank and pay of their present grade; consequently this is a measure of saving and economy to the Government, and under the rules of this House it would not be subject, in my judgment, to the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair decides, I want to repeat what has been said about the effect of this amendment, that it will prevent officers from being advanced a grade and that advancement would carry with it additional pay, so that the effect of the clause is to reduce the the expenditures of the Government and clearly comes within the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion this paragraph is justified by that portion of Rule XXI and overrules the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 11, insert as an additional paragraph the following——

Mr. CULLOP. I make the point of order that both that paragraph and the next has been passed; it has been read and debate begun on the present paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed the Clerk has completed the reading of the paragraph to which the amendment is intended to apply, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 11, as an additional paragraph, add the following:

"That after January 1, 1914, no captain or commander of the line of the Navy, who is not restricted by law to shore duty only, shall be promoted to the next higher grade who has not performed at least two full years of sea service in cruising ships of the Navy in his grade, and any captain or commander who has not complied with the qualifications for promotion by the date of occurrence of his vacancy for promotion shall be placed on the retired list: Provided, That this qualification may be waived by the Secretary of the Navy for meritorious administrative reasons: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress at each ensuing regular session the reasons for the waiver of this qualification in each case wherever exercised: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall furnish an opportunity for such sea service to all officers making application therefor to comply with the requirements of this provision: And provided further, That during the next fiscal year no promotions shall be made to the grade of rear admiral on the active list of any officer who shall have served over 42 years, and such length of service shall be decreased one year for each succeeding fiscal year until eventually no officer shall be so promoted who shall have served over 38 years, such service in each case to count from the officer's official date of precedence."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this is subject to the point of order. The effect of it is to reduce expenditures. It provides for sea service instead of shore service, and the difference of shore pay and allowance is greater than sea-service pay.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question right there?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman from Tennessee tell the committee how much the reduction is in compensation of any officer in the Navy under the amendment which he has just offered in the committee?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How much will the aggregate reduction in the Naval Establishment be if the gentleman's amendment is adopted?

Mr. PADGETT. Of course, I could not give that because I can never give at any one time the number of officers who may be on shore or at sea, but I can give you the report and you can see from the report in its work it will be a substantial reduction.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, can not the gentleman give the committee the information which will enable it to act intelligently as to whether there will be any reduction in the aggregate?

Mr. PADGETT. I think so.

Mr. MADDEN. If so, I think the gentleman should do so. I do not see any reason, if there be a reduction, why the gentleman can not tell what the reduction will be.

How can the Chair decide whether this, under the rule, will be admissible as an amendment unless he is able to know definitely whether it is a reduction or an increase?

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman let me answer?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADGETT. The shore pay of a captain is $5,000. His allowances on shore are $1,296, and then he has for lights, and so forth, $376.32, making the allowances $1,672.32 and his total shore compensation $6,672.32. The pay of a captain at sea is $5,500 flat, so that there would be a difference of $1,172.32 between the compensation received by the captain on shore and on sea.

Take a commander. A commander's pay is $4,500. His allowances are $1,142.88, making his shore compensation $5,642.88. His sea compensation is $4,950 flat, making a difference of $692.88 in favor of the sea service. Now, then, if you will take those figures and multiply them by the number of captains and the number of commanders who are sent from shore duty to sea duty, you can arrive at the amount.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, I understand the point the gentleman makes as to the lowest pay at sea, but would not the provision that the Secretary must afford an opportunity for sea duty to any officer who asks for it necessitate the putting of other ships in commission and thereby very largely increase instead of reducing the cost?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know that it would, but I think not, because with the ships that we have, allowing two years to each captain, there would be plenty of time to give each captain his two years' service without forcing extra ships into commission.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But you compel the Secretary to afford an opportunity for sea service to anyone who asks it.

Mr. PADGETT. But for two years. We require him if there is an opportunity for two years' service.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the gentleman can not assure us that he would not.

Mr. PADGETT. But the captain in the grade would be in the captain's grade four years or more, so that on each ship you could have the service of two captains at least.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I am an honest seeker after light, as I am not familiar with the operations of the Navy. What I want to get at is, Would there really be any actual increase in the number of officers afloat and an actual decrease in the number on shore, or would it not necessitate the sending of officers on shore to the sea and require the officers now on the sea to be sent ashore?

Mr. PADGETT. I think it would increase the number to go to sea, and that is the object of the committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is a worthy purpose, I think.

Mr. PADGETT. The register shows a very large proportion of captains and commanders performing shore duty, and we felt there should be some provision that would require a larger percentage of captains and commanders to go to sea.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Another question, if the gentleman will pardon me. Are not all the ships afloat now equipped with the proper complement of officers?

Mr. BUTLER. No; many of the ships are out of commission.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Are not the ships that are in commission at sea equipped with the proper complement of officers now?

Mr. PADGETT. I am informed that they are not.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If they are not, I can see how your amendment would effect a saving; but if they are, I do not see how you can send those ashore to sea and remove those on the sea and send them ashore.

Mr. TRIBBLE, Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts, and Mr. TILSON rose.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am in sympathy with part of the gentleman's amendment, but I want him to explain this to me: You provide in there that after officers shall make the service at 41 they shall not be permitted to serve in certain ranks, and you provide it shall be so reduced that it will get down to 37 years. Now, is it not a matter of fact that you are providing to retire old men from the service on $6,000 and $7,000 salary, retired pay, and provide a place for younger men to take their place; and will it not increase by putting these men on the salary and putting in new blood, as you call it, and making places for others—just the very thing I have been complaining here about?

Mr. PADGETT. It has just exactly the opposite effect, if you will just let me explain it. An admiral of the upper nine, or the first nine, who retires gets compensation at $6,600. The admiral of the second nine, or lower nine, has retired pay of $4,950. This is to force retirement in the captain's grade instead of permitting the captains to go up to admirals at 59 or 60 years of age, because under the general law in the Navy they must retire at 62; and if a captain becomes an admiral at 60 he can remain in the service only one year, and then he is retired as an admiral at an admiral's pay.

Now, this provides for a decrease gradually. It provides, first, that the officer must have a service of four years as admiral or he can not be promoted, and must be retired as a captain. The next year he must have five years of service as an admiral or he will be retired as a captain. The next year it is provided that he must have six years of service as an admiral, and the next year seven years, so that it ultimately means that a captain must be promoted to an admiral at 55 years of age, on a general average, and have seven years of service, and those who can not be promoted to admiral will be retired as captains on the lower pay. The captain gets $4,125, instead of $4,950 as an admiral of the lower grade, or $6,600 as an admiral of the upper grade; and if he is retired as a commander, he is retired at $3,712.50 as a commander, instead of $4,125 as a captain, or at $4,950 or $6,600 as an admiral.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, why retire him at $3,712.50 if he is a good man? What do you want to take him out for?

Mr. PADGETT. I have answered that question of the gentleman so often that I suspect my obtuseness in making myself clear and understood. I have stated that there must be a retirement provision in order to permit a flow in promotions; that if there are no promotions——

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does not that increase the retired list?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; because they will ultimately retire as admirals after short service, whereas this enforces retirement as commanders and captains at smaller pay.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Are there not more commanders than admirals?

Mr. PADGETT. The same number would be retired, whether as admirals or captains. The proposition is to substitute retirements of commanders and captains instead of admirals and captains.

Mr. TRIBBLE. That would be all right if you had not the plucking board to take men out.

Mr. HOBSON. I may say to the gentleman that under the operation of this provision the plucking board would have nothing to do.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Then, if you pass this you would have to repeal the law authorizing the creation of the plucking board.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I am in full sympathy with the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, so far as I understood it from hearing same read by the reading clerk; but I realize that one must possess somewhat of a technical knowledge of the intricacies of the Navy in order to thoroughly grasp the effect of the legislation proposed in this amendment. I want to ask the gentleman who offers same if he does not think he has not made the term of sea service too short? Ought not an officer to be required to serve three years at sea in a particular grade before promotion to the next higher grade?

Mr. PADGETT. I think not. The captain's service is about four years. The younger officers serve about 75 or 80 per cent of their time at sea, and then as commanders it is about 65 per cent, as I remember it. This provides that the commanders and captains must serve what is estimated to be about 50 per cent. Now, it is impossible to name a percentage, for the reason that we have no basis on which to predicate it, so that we have arrived at what is supposed to be 50 per cent of the time at sea.

Mr. BURLESON. I understand that, and repeat that I am in sympathy with what the gentleman has in mind to accomplish by this amendment, as I have stated; but I believe it would be very much improved if you provided for three instead of two years' service at sea.

I notice further that there is a proviso in the amendment to the effect that the Secretary of the Navy can waive the requirement of sea service preliminary to promotion to the higher grade in the event, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, the officer has rendered meritorious administrative services.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no. There is nothing of that kind in it.

Mr. BURLESON. I fear there is, and I would like the gentleman to read again that proviso to which I refer. I think it should be stricken from the amendment. And I fear the last proviso is also objectionable.

Mr. PADGETT. No; I will explain it in a moment, and then the gentleman will be in full accord with it, I think. It reads:

Provided, That this qualification may be waived by the Secretary of the Navy for meritorious administrative reasons.

Mr. BURLESON. To what qualification is reference made? That is, the qualification acquired by the sea service that is required as a prerequisite for promotion.

Mr. PADGETT. No. It becomes necessary for a captain to be appointed Chief of the Bureau of Navigation or Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, or any of the bureaus, or to be appointed captain of a navy yard or commandant of a navy yard. He is performing an administrative duty. The committee think that the best service will be rendered by not having too frequent changes in those administrative officers, and this provision is in order that they may have a three-year service in conducting these businesses for the Government. If a man is appointed chief of a bureau he can serve out the term. If he was required to perform this sea duty, it would necessitate taking him from that place and putting somebody else there. This is only to afford to the department an opportunity to detail these men to perform these important administrative duties and then notify Congress in each case of the specific reason.

Mr. BURLESON. So, in particular cases, this requirement can be waived by the Secretary of the Navy and an officer who has been continuously on land be promoted to the next higher grade without having had actual sea service during the time he had held the grade from which he is promoted. That ought not to be. No officer should be made a captain without having had some sea service as a commander.

Mr. PADGETT. There might be a few cases.

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand it, that is the very evil we are trying to obviate. No naval officer should become a rear admiral without having had actual sea service in every grade, from ensign to and including captain.

Mr. PADGETT. We are trying not to break up the administration of these important positions.

Mr. BURLESON. As a matter of fact, and I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill the question, Are there not cases, many of them, where naval officers have become rear admirals without having served as long as two years at sea? That frequently naval officers are promoted from one grade to the next higher without ever having served a day at sea in the lower grade?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know. I am not prepared to answer that question.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman state that it is not a fact?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not. I said I was not prepared to answer, because I have not looked into it; but the gentleman will realize that it is not good administration to assign a man to be the head of one of the great industrial institutions that we have in our navy yards, and keep him there for 18 months or 2 years, and when he has learned the business and becomes efficient change him and put a new man in there, and then at the end of 18 months or 2 years take him out and put in another new man. That is the very thing that the committee have been trying to avoid, and wherever we have seen it we have been criticizing it. We have insisted that these terms be made sufficiently long so that when a man acquaints himself with the duties of such a position he shall be kept there to render efficient service to the Government.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not understand the full scope and effect of this amendment, but the gentleman tells me he really believes it will correct, in a measure if not entirely, the abuses to which I have alluded, and which have grown up in this particular in the Navy Department.

Mr. PADGETT. I think it will correct them.

Mr. BURLESON. And will eliminate some of the gross favoritism which has been practiced by the department in the matter of shore duty and promotion without actual sea service?

Mr. PADGETT. I think it will correct it absolutely so far as favoritism is concerned; but, necessarily, we must have some provision that will allow the President to appoint men to be chiefs of bureaus where the term is by law four years, and will allow him to designate men as commandants and captains of navy yards, and not necessitate a continued revolution and rotation of these men, and produce anarchy in the yards and in the bureaus.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state again that I believe I am somewhat familiar with the objectionable conditions that the gentleman is striking at, and I believe, through this amendment, if adopted, that it will effect economy; and I hope it will—in a measure, if not wholly—eliminate some of the abuses that have grown up in the Navy Department in connection with shore duty by naval officers, some of whom are now holding down positions of bureau chiefs and in line, under the law as it now is, for rear admiralships after certain length of service, who have never had as much as one year's service at sea in the various grades—officers who, through favoritism, may actually become rear admirals without ever having actually commanded at sea so much as a tugboat.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will yield.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I understood the gentleman to make use of the words "the committee thought" such and such things, in speaking of this amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to say that this is not a committee amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. That is the point I want to bring out. This amendment has not been brought up in the committee, and when the chairman of the committee stated the thoughts of the committee with regard to these provisions it was an inadvertence and should not carry with it the weight of committee action.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman misunderstood what the chairman of the committee said. The chairman said that it was the opinion of the committee that the term of service of commandants and captains at navy yards should be long enough to secure efficient service. I did not say this was a committee amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Has there been any expression of opinion in the committee as to the length of time that a man should be in command of a navy yard?

Mr. PADGETT. Very decidedly; in the hearings.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Has there been such an expression by any vote?

Mr. PADGETT. Not by a vote.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Simply an impression gathered by hearing questions asked?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. When I hear questions asked, and when I hear comments made, I can form an idea as to the opinion indicated by the question.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman tell the House from what source this amendment came at this late hour, where it emanated?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I have no objection to that. The former chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], suggested and insisted upon the provision that refers to the sea service. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has talked with me time and again about presenting such a measure to the House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] suggested and formulated the proviso with reference to the captains, requiring a definite term of service before they should be appointed admirals. That is the inspiration that prompted it. I will say further that other gentlemen in the House have talked with me about the matter and we have looked into the record. The other day we had a conversation in which I believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TURNBULL], and myself were present. We looked over the matter and tried to formulate it so that it would accomplish its purpose.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I have nothing to say against those gentlemen; they are all very good men, but the balance of the committee was at call and you could have got us on the phone.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman explain why he brought such an important amendment before the House without giving the other members of the committee an opportunity to consider it?

Mr. PADGETT. At the last meeting of the committee several members expressed the hope that no further general meeting of the committee would be called, that they were busy, and hoped that the chairman would not call another general meeting. Any member of the committee has the right to offer an amendment, and we are submitting this amendment on our own responsibility, with the distinct statement that it is not a committee amendment.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I have no objection to the personnel of the gentlemen who offer it, but there are others on the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. PADGETT. It is not submitted as a committee amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty sympathy with the policy of the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the Chair understand that the point of order has been made? I made the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. I understood the gentleman reserved it.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made, and the Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. We are explaining why and how it is that it comes under the Holman rule.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be allowed to go to the heel of this bill in order that the Members of the House may have an opportunity to see whether it is going to cost the Government several million dollars more.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, the point of order has been made against the amendment, and the question in my mind is whether or not this will increase the expenditure of the department or decrease it, but having taken into consideration the fact that the policy enunciated by this amendment, instead of carrying out economy, instead of 29 battleships, will it not take 35 battleships for the number of officers to go aboard of the ships? Further, is not there going to be an increase in the expenditure for coal and for operating expenses; and if so, how much will that be?

Mr. PADGETT. As I stated in answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], I thought not; I thought that the ships that were in commission and that captains and commanders would be on these ships instead of on shore, and I did not think it would produce an increase of expenditure. I tried to give figures demonstrating, as I thought, that it would be of a very substantial and material economy, and in addition to the question of economy, that it would add very substantially to the efficiency of the Navy; and, according to my old-fashioned ideas, efficiency results in economy.

Mr. HOWARD. I agree with the gentleman about that. Now, I want to address myself for half a minute to the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to say that I have not yielded the floor, but if any gentleman wants to ask me a question I will answer it; if not, I am ready to yield it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the point of order has been raised and is pending and will be for the Chair to determine, and therefore I do not intend to address my remarks to any tribunal except the Chair. If you will look at this amendment you will see that on its face it is a law. It is by appearance a law, and in fact it is a law. It is not contended, as I understand, by the chairman of the committee that his proposed amendment offends no law nor creates one. It matters not to me how the amendment may have appeared here, but I did not know of it as it is. I have no complaint to make, because it is the privilege of the chairman of the committee to offer this amendment if he sees fit. I had seen, however, an amendment similar to this, but the proposed amendment which is now pending is an alteration of the one I saw.

Mr. Chairman, if this is a law, it is clearly out of order unless it shall retrench expenditures by a reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States. That it does not pretend to do, except by indirection, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has stated. I will show directly that it does not have that effect. Secondly, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States. By indirection he makes the attempt to show that it does. If he is correct in that, if this is a reduction of expenditures, I will concede it is in order. But it is not. If you look at this amendment you will see that after the 1st of January, 1914, no officer of the grade of captain or of commander can be promoted to the next grade unless he shall have served two years at sea. There are in the Navy, provided by law, so many captains and so many commanders. There are 70 captains and there are 112 or 115 commanders, and it will be noticed further along in this amendment that it is said that every commander and every captain shall go to sea if he so demands. What will be necessary? First, to provide him with a ship upon which he shall sail and exercise his command.

Mr. LONGWORTH and Mr. PADGETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. To the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has stated the number of captains and the number of commanders. Can he also state the number of captains that are short of requisite sea service and the number of commanders that are short?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I have it all here. Furthermore, let me make this statement——

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman stated that there were 70 captains. Thirty-five ships would furnish all the captains for the reason that a captain's grade is a little more than four years, and two years' service at sea would give each captain two years, and then the next two years, so that in each grade 2 captains could serve upon 1 ship and 35 ships would answer all necessities.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, pardon my digression while I answer that question. I have great confidence in the chairman of the committee, and I have great affection for him, but I can not take his statement upon something that involves the knowledge of a naval expert. Let me give him the figures. I know the gentleman is stating the question as he sees it and as he understands it. I will ask the chairman to look at that part of the provision which compels every officer to go to sea if he sees fit to make the demand. The Chair will have to learn from somewhere, from somebody, and from some place whether or not this is a reduction of expenditures. Let me suggest that in the very last construction put upon the Holman rule it was held by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], who was presiding over the Committee of the Whole, considering the Army appropriation bill, that this reduction must appear upon the face of the paper. That is not so in this case. But he went further and said that you may have recourse to law. I think that is right. If by considering the amendment and the law at the same time it naturally and directly follows that there is a reduction of expenditure, the amendment is in order; otherwise not.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I am not familiar with the amendment; but does the gentleman claim that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, like a judge, should refer the matter to a master in chancery to take evidence and report?

Mr. BUTLER. No; I do not.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. It must be evident upon its face.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois that inquiry be made as to whether the expenses would be an increase or a decrease, I will say, as a matter of truth, if this matter had been brought before the Committee on Naval Affairs we had the machinery there to make that investigation.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And we have not got it here?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman propose to take the simple statement of the gentleman who wants to pass the bill as to whether this amendment will create a growing increase or not? Does the gentleman think that is fair?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I have already said that upon any subject with which our chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee is thoroughly familiar I will take his judgment.

Mr. TRIBBLE. So will I.

Mr. BUTLER. But I say that in this case, as against men who have especial opportunity and who have spent their lives in the service accounting and figuring, the opinion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] ought not to be taken.

Mr. TRIBBLE. May I ask the gentleman another question? Since this matter has not been brought before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on Naval Affairs is supposed to investigate questions of this kind and not a select coterie from the Committee on Naval Affairs, I ask the gentleman if my proposition is not a fair one, that this question go to the heel of this bill in order that Members, and especially the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, may have an opportunity to investigate it and see whether it is going to decrease or diminish the expenditures of the Navy?

Mr. BUTLER. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Georgia, all these measures are now being considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs. They are all a part of what is known as the personnel bill, which has been introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which is now pending before that committee, upon which we have had five or six hearings and, as I understand the proposition—now will the gentleman listen to me—our purpose was to consider it as a whole and not that there should be choice pieces picked out, a part here and there, of that naval personnel bill. Have I answered the gentleman?

Mr. TRIBBLE. The hearing the gentleman speaks of is the one in which Capt. Smith, considered to be an expert in the Navy—and he is an expert—testified for the last week and until Friday of last week; and was there a word as to this matter? It seems to me this important question should have at least been discussed in committee and evidence produced so that each member of the committee could form an intelligent opinion.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; Capt. Smith's proposition, the highest authority upon that subject, and I think all our friends on the committee will agree no man ever gave his evidence more candidly and unselfishly than Capt. Smith, and therefore we consider him as we do, as being the highest authority; but it is the privilege of a member of this committee, it is the privilege of any Member of this House sitting as a part of this committee to offer an amendment, and I have no criticism to make of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to say in that connection that the last proviso of that amendment was prepared by Capt. Smith himself and written into the amendment, and the first paragraph of it was suggested to me by him, and I took his words and wrote them down myself. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentlemen of the committee please applaud that statement, because Capt. Smith is deserving of their emphatic approval. I did not know wholly of this proposed amendment, and therefore in my ignorance I stand here partly uninformed. Having been a member of this committee for 16 years I think by the heavens on high I have a right to have some notice of what is taking place and of what is to take place. I do not criticize the gentleman for——

Mr. TRIBBLE and Mr. PADGETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to myself. I will yield to no other. I propose to knock this out on the point of order if I can, and I propose to carry on the war against it as far as my opportunity and ability will sustain me. I think that having sat 16 years upon one committee, having devoted a whole lifetime to it, I might have been told about this proposed amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a personal explanation to him?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to state that this morning about two minutes before the meeting of the House at 11 o'clock Capt. Smith came to the committee room and suggested a modification of this amendment to me, and I asked him to prepare it. He prepared the last proviso and sent it to me here at the desk. I then went to the committee room and saw him for a few minutes and talked the matter over with him, and I had no objection to showing it to the gentleman, but I had no opportunity to do so.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. May I ask which amendment was prepared by Capt. Smith?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. And there was no discourtesy or disposition to hide it from anybody.

Mr. BUTLER. When I rise to be chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs I am not intending to get even with Mr. PADGETT, whose fairness is admitted, and I hope, of course, to be chairman of that committee some day.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee which change in the amendment was suggested by Capt. Smith this morning?

Mr. PADGETT. The last proviso.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Did he suggest the first change, and when was that drafted?

Mr. PADGETT. Which change?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Changing the year in which the retirement takes effect.

Mr. PADGETT. That was simply a typographical error. When we agreed upon it, we agreed upon January 1, 1914, but the clerk in writing it wrote it "1913." I ran a pencil through "13" and wrote "14" above it, because it was an error in copying.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, when the chairman of the committee uses the plural "we" he does not intend to include the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I made that correction myself, and I believe Capt. HOBSON was sitting here when I called attention to it that it was simply a correction made in the copying.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman know whether that change from the printed copy which I have here and which was discussed in the subcommittee will make any change in the effect in the first section of the bill if it becomes a law?

Mr. PADGETT. You talk about the subcommittee. When we were meeting the other day you will remember that personally I wanted July 1, 1915, but it was finally suggested that it should be July 1, 1914; but in copying it the Clerk wrote it "1913," though 1914 was agreed upon.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to argue the point of order which I made.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, this is a special privilege, which, I understand, under the rules, belongs to me. I have the right to continue this argument until the Chair acknowledges its disposition to hear another. I want to acquit the chairman of the committee of any attempt to be uncivil to any of us. I only make a little complaint. Sitting down at the end of a table, and far remote from the chairman, I would like to be advised when the House is to be fired, so I may escape.

Mr. Chairman, when I discovered that an amendment of this character was proposed and it was the purpose of members of the committee to submit it, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, asking him what its effect would be, and in his reply to me he said this:

> Three captains and two commanders who, if ordered to sea on July 1, 1912—

And that is when I thought the period was 1913—

> Would not be able to complete this requirement and would, on coming up for promotion, be retired in their grade.

And consequently, if it had stood at that period, there would have been shown on the face of the proposed amendment an increase instead of a decrease in the expenditure. But that date has been changed to January 1, 1914, and the increase does not appear here, so I turn to another part of the Secretary's letter, in which he says that the operation of this amendment will cost next year $28,115,100, and that statement, I understand, is prepared by the high authority—Capt. Smith—so referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. Therefore if Capt. Smith is cited as an authority upon one side, he ought to be accepted as an authority upon the other. The Secretary says:

> While the proviso that the Secretary may waive this sea-service qualification appears to relieve the stringency of the proposed amendment, the further proviso that the Secretary shall furnish an opportunity for such sea service to all officers making application therefor operates to nullify to some extent the power of the Secretary to excuse officers from fulfilling the requirement. In an attempt to give officers the required sea service, it would be necessary for the department—

Please have this in your mind—

> It would be necessary for the department to place additional ships in commission, thus necessitating an additional immediate maximum cost in maintenance of ships, stores, and probable repairs of approximately $28,115,100 in money per annum, and an increase of about 1,424 officers of intermediate and lower grades and 18,500 men.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will you read that last section over again?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. All right, let us have it again.

Mr. BUTLER. Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, a minute. I can not be uncivil to my colleague.

Mr. TRIBBLE. We are traveling the same line together.

Mr. BUTLER. It says:

> In an attempt to give officers the required sea service, it would be necessary for the department to place additional ships in commission, thus necessitating an additional immediate maximum cost in maintenance of ships, stores, and probable repairs of approximately $28,115,100 in money per annum, and an increase of about 1,424 officers of intermediate and lower grades and 18,500 men. Though, as these officers and men are not available, the full number could not be placed in commission.

Mr. Chairman, while that in part bears upon the merits, I read it in your presence, sir, so that you might know the extent to which the Treasury will be taxed beyond what it is taxed at this time by the adoption of the proposed amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. In reference to the application of the Holman rule, is it not a fact that in order to bring this within that rule the parties proposing the amendment should show by the amendment that it will decrease expenditures by the amendment or by the bill, and it is not incumbent upon those who make the point of order to show it will increase it?

Mr. BUTLER. Replying to the question of my friend from Georgia, that is the law established and recognized here, and, furthermore, let me call to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the act of Congress which provides pay for officers and men at sea. Let me call your attention to the law. It was overlooked, not intentionally, but it was overlooked. The act of Congress providing pay for officers and men at sea added 10 per cent additional to their salary and shall be paid to them when they are beyond the continental limits of the United States.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. That is entirely true, and in the statement I made I neglected it. They get 10 per cent additional increase on their salary, but they get no allowances. The allowances ashore are far more than the 10 per cent increase at sea, and so the net result is that the sea service is considerably less.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, there are some things in this world that we all can learn, and some things that we all can understand. We are now approaching a point in the construction of this Holman rule that will turn out to be useful to all of us. On the one side it is contended that there will be a decrease of expenditures, and on the other side it is contended that there will be an increase, and by both sides the same authority is cited. Under those circumstances what is the Chairman to do? He must see whether there is a reduction in officers or reduction of their pay. Let me go further. They are not new. The details of this added cost are fully shown, Mr. Chairman. They are wholly shown in the letter to the chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs on this same subject, dated March 28, 1912, which apply closely to the requirements of the proposed amendments.

Now let me give you a little further information.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman that letter in his possession?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I have that letter. Here it is. At this time I will not go into it. If the Chair should overrule the point of order, then we will use it in the discussion of the merits. I think that the Chair will have no difficulty in reaching a correct conclusion. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said, Shall the Chair convert itself into a chancery expert in order to determine whether or not there is a reduction? The burden of showing the decrease is upon him who alleges it.

The battleships now in commission for captains are 31, the armored cruisers in commission for captains are 10, making 41 in all. There are in commission: Battleships, 21; armored cruisers, 5; members to be commissioned to carry this out, of the captain's grade alone, 12; ships for captains yet to be put into commission—let me go further—cruisers and gunboats for command, 34; battleships and armored cruisers on which executive officers serve, 41; unarmored cruisers on which executive officers serve, 35; other executive officers on battleships and cruisers, 10; places required, 62; other places to be made, 27.

Now, while there is no act of Congress which prescribes the duties of a captain or a commander, it is provided that it is within the power of the President of the United States to detail either of them in command of a fleet. Therefore, that provision which enables the officer to demand his sea service as a commander or captain might be in conflict with the authority conferred by statute upon the President of the United States.

But, assuming that this proposed amendment is in violation of law, you come to the next question, which I have endeavored to impress upon the Chair, and that is: Does this amendment upon its face indicate that it will result in a reduction of expenditures upon the United States Treasury? If the Chair has any doubt about the proposed amendment repealing existing law, please permit me to cite the acts of Congress, where I can show that it violates half a dozen of them distinctly. If this proposed amendment indicates upon its face that it will result in a reduction of expenditures, I will agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that it is in order. If it does not, it is out of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word and I shall be through. Will the Chair allow me in my time to have read from the desk a paragraph from a letter. I am tired and I do not want to talk more than is absolutely necessary to convince. Those statements are taken from a letter from the Secretary of the Navy under date of March 28, 1912—a letter addressed to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, through its chairman. In that letter the Chair will not find the expense summed at $28,000,000, but he will find it set out specifically and by items, showing the cost which this amendment will involve upon the Treasury.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts and Mr. TRIBBLE rose.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to have that read first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Propositions (a) and (b) are both physically impossible of execution. There are at present sufficient captains and commanders for the whole fleet, but the other grades of officers and the men are materially short. To commission the whole fleet, which would be necessary to carry out the provisions for captains and commanders, would require an increase of approximately 1,424 officers and 18,500 men. This would add to the annual expense of the Navy about $3,956,000 in pay of officers, and $10,220,000 in pay and rations of men, and $3,650,000 in maintenance, and $1,350,000 for probable repairs, making a total of $19,176,000. These figures do not include 43 vessels now under construction. To keep them in active service would require approximately 291 officers and 6,400 men. This would add annually to the above figures about $808,400 in pay of officers, and $3,535,700 in pay and rations of men, and $3,370,000 in maintenance, and $1,125,000 for probable repairs, making a total for vessels under construction of $8,939,100. The above figures show that it would cost annually to place all serviceable vessels now on the Navy list and those under construction in active service $28,115,100.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I will conclude with this statement: I do not know what the observation of the Chair has been on naval subjects, and therefore permit me to inform you that our fleets at this time are on a peace footing, and it is not the policy of Congress to keep them upon a war footing. If this amendment is put in force it will be necessary to increase our fleet to that condition. You will recall that captains and commanders are officers of very high rank. One corresponds in rank with a colonel in the Army and the other with a lieutenant colonel in the Army. Therefore you only order one of each grade upon the same ship. That is prescribed by the regulations. Such a command may be given by the President of the United States. Therefore to put these men at sea, in pursuance of the congressional order contained in this amendment, in the commands that they are properly entitled to, it will be necessary to make a yearly drain upon the Treasury amounting to $29,000,000.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I should like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, all these gentlemen have been heard on one side of the point of order. I should like to be heard on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama on the other side.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to support the proposition that the point of order does not lie. The question is not a complicated one. The effect of this amendment would be to modify somewhat the present proportions of assignments of officers. I want to point out that it is within the power of the Secretary of the Navy to put more ships in commission.

Mr. MADDEN. That means more expense.

Mr. HOBSON. If he does that he will incur greater expense. But the point at issue is that this amendment does not require him to do it.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that the number of ships in usual commission in the American Navy as compared with those of other navies is sufficient, without putting another ship in commission, to afford all officers, if they take their turns, an opportunity to fulfill the requirements of this amendment. There is generally a large number of officers ashore who ought to be at sea. On the contrary, I am convinced—and all those who are familiar with the existing conditions are likewise convinced——

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly; and I will not tell the gentleman to go far back and sit down.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will say to the gentleman that I only said that to him in a case where I thought it was proper for me to do so. Now, I wish to ask, Why are these officers ashore?

Mr. HOBSON. I am very glad to answer that. Mr. Chairman, we are all human. Many officers have families. It is an unfortunate incident of efficiency in the military service that you have to be separated from your family for long intervals of time when you are at sea. Unless there is some provision that will cause officers to overcome that natural inclination, you will find in our service, and in all services, that officers inevitably tend to gravitate ashore where they can be with their families. I do not criticize them. I know the lives of devotion and sacrifice that they live.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HOBSON. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman admit that under the provisions of the Holman rule an amendment providing for legislation in an appropriation bill must show on its face a reduction in the expenses of the establishment to which it refers?

Mr. HOBSON. No; I am under the opposite impression that the burden of proof is on the other side. When an amendment is offered, and a statement is made that it comes under the rule, if a point of order is made against it the burden of proof rests on the man making the point of order.

Mr. TRIBBLE. May I ask the gentleman a question? Is not the evidence offered here the highest that could possibly be produced—the statement of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. HOBSON. I am proceeding to point out how that does not lie in this particular case. Of course if the number of junior officers is to be increased to fill up all of our ships, if all those ships are then to be put in commission and put at sea, there will be the increase that the Secretary of the Navy points out; but the point I maintain is that in our Navy there is no provision of law or regulation that requires a certain amount of sea service as a prerequisite for promotion in any grade. It is a weakness of our service. In almost every other service they apply it not only to the higher grades but even lower down, and it is one of the weaknesses of our service that frequently men are promoted out of a grade without ever having been to sea in that grade.

Of course in answering these questions I may be said to be digressing, but I want it to be distinctly understood that nothing in this amendment requires the Secretary of the Navy to maintain a larger number of ships in commission than ordinarily are maintained.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The Secretary of the Navy says he has an overabundance of officers, and you gentlemen have brought in a bill saying that we have not enough, and providing for 100 or 200 more.

Mr. HOBSON. If the gentleman refers to the naval personnel bill, we followed the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Alabama has said that there is nothing that would require the Secretary of the Navy to put additional ships in commission. There is a provision in this very amendment that requires him to at the request of the officer.

Mr. HOBSON. I will change that. The gentleman is right. It is possible that if an immediate compliance with the provision were made, if all the officers affected made a request at once, in compliance with this provision, it might require an additional expense, but just what that would amount to it is difficult to determine.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman gives away his whole case, it seems to me, because this shows that it is possible, if not probable, that the amendment will cause a vast increase in the appropriation instead of a decrease.

Mr. HOBSON. Of course the gentleman realizes that the chairman of the committee can strike out the part requiring the Secretary to assign officers to sea duty upon application.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; but we are debating the amendment as it now stands.

Mr. HOBSON. This amendment was not originally drawn with that provision in it which would give the officer a chance to demand an opportunity to go to sea. It was put in there for the purpose of enabling him to go to sea if the Secretary of the Navy, in persecution, refused it. But the intent of this amendment is to cause a healthy distribution of service, unfortunately not in the interest of the home life of the officers, but in the interest of the efficiency of the Navy and resulting in economy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And now the gentleman is debating the merits of the question.

Mr. HOBSON. No; I am only answering questions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is debating the merits, and he has shown that the passage of this amendment may put additional ships into commission, and thereby cause a vast increase in the expense, far from showing on its face a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. HOBSON. I will admit that in its present form there might be an increase by putting a few ships into commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that he is prepared to rule.

Mr. HOBSON. I will close up what I have to say, Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will cease asking me questions.

Mr. MADDEN. I was just going to ask the gentleman on the point of order. The gentleman from Alabama will be willing to admit that the Holman rule is intended to be an exception to the general rules of the House.

Mr. HOBSON. Evidently; that is, what has otherwise been the general rule; but the Holman rule is becoming the general rule of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. If this amendment is offered under what is termed the Holman rule, it must be offered with the intent to reduce the expenditures of the Naval Establishment, otherwise it would not be in order. If that is the case, then the amendment on its face must show the intended reduction, otherwise it would not be in order. Now, while it pretends to come under the exception, the gentleman will have to place himself within the exception by being able to show that it is a reduction of the expenses in the Naval Establishment.

Mr. HOBSON. I will bring myself to the point of order and not discuss the merits, which we can discuss later. The evident effect of this amendment is to decrease the proportion of officers on shore and increase the proportion of those at sea. This change would result in a distinct decrease in the pay out of the Treasury. In addition, the effect would be to increase the number of officers retired in lower grades and decrease the number retired in the higher grades.

Under the operation of such a law officers who have been neglecting their profession by remaining on shore duty too long, who have been neglecting opportunities to go to sea, would, in some cases, be retired at a lower grade and not be allowed to be promoted. Their suffering would be unfortunate, but the effect would be to increase the professional efficiency of the service and lower the expense of the Government.

When we take up the requirement of a reasonable time to serve as a qualification for promotion to the grade of admiral, let me tell the Members of this House that the expense of the retired list to the United States to-day in its Navy is a crying scandal to all principles of economy. It is not the fault of any officer. I will pay my tribute to them in their turn; but our system to-day turns out the average rear admiral with less than two years of service. Consequently he can not be expected to become efficient. We have to-day on the retired list of the Navy 196 admirals and commodores. One hundred and forty-nine admirals are on the retired list and 28 on the active list, more than five times as many retired as on active duty.

The total retired pay of the Navy is something over $3,000,000. The total retired pay for the rear admirals and commodores is $1,000,000. I shall not discuss the merits of this case, but the present system completely undermines the efficiency of our flag officers and of the service, and for this inefficiency we pay over a $1,000,000 a year.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I assume that the committee is basing its reliance on this amendment being in order upon the fact that it will reduce expenses.

Mr. HOBSON. That is the Holman rule.

Mr. WEEKS. Would it not be possible to definitely figure out just what would be the result of this amendment, taking the retirements for the next half-dozen years and the promotions as a result of such retirements, and thereby definitely show whether there would be a saving or not?

Mr. HOBSON. I can tell the gentleman at once that there would be probably, if this went into effect at once, in the next five years 15, 20, maybe 30 officers who would be retired as captains instead of admirals.

Mr. WEEKS. Is there any necessity for this being problematical in any way? Can not the result of this change be definitely determined?

Mr. HOBSON. It could in time, perhaps, assuming no deaths occur, and that the question of promotion is not affected by the plucking board and other matters.

Mr. WEEKS. One other question I want to ask. I notice in looking over the Navy Register that there are only two captains on the list who have performed over two years' sea service, and that there are only two commanders who have performed over two years of sea service in those grades.

If this law went into effect in 1914, it would mean that every captain on the list as well as every commander would necessarily have to go to sea at some time to make up the difference between the lacking sea service and the two years that he would have to perform in order not to be affected by this proposed law. I want to ask the gentleman this question, because his training should enable him to answer it: Does he not think that such frequent changes of commanders of ships as would be necessitated by this action would greatly impair the efficiency of the service?

Mr. HOBSON. I would answer that by saying that if an attempt were made to carry out the suggestion of the gentleman you would have to keep most of them permanently at sea the rest of all those two years. But think of the appalling condition to which the gentleman has called attention, where there are only two captains and two commanders in the Navy of the United States who have had two years at sea! There are 70 captains and 112 commanders on the regular active list and only two have had two years at sea.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the senior captain has only been a captain four years on the 1st of July, and the same may be said of the senior commander. If any more of these commanding officers are going to sea, does it not necessarily mean putting more ships in commission?

Mr. HOBSON. I would say to the gentleman that if the Secretary of the Navy should undertake at once to make up for all of the delinquencies of the officers of those two lists he would probably have to put more ships in commission, but if the gentleman wants to bring it to that point——

Mr. WEEKS. Then there would be no economy.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not even admit that. It would be a question of adjustment. That can be stricken out of this amendment—requiring the Secretary of the Navy to send the men to sea on application. It is not an essential part of this amendment.

In conclusion, the examination of this amendment on its face indicates not only that it is trying to reach a grave condition of inefficiency in the two commanding ranks of the Navy, the admirals and the captains, upon whom must depend the issue of battle, and where is shown a weakness in comparison with every active navy in the world, but it is in fulfillment of legitimate promises and purposes on this side of the House that in taking hold of the responsibilities of the Government we will try to increase the efficiency of the service, and at the same time reduce the expense. With a due proportion in the grade of captains and admirals at sea as compared to those on shore, and with a sufficiently long term of service in the grade of admiral, I do not hesitate to say that the cost of the retired list of admirals will be cut down more than one-half, and that the cost of the retired list of the Navy would doubtless year in and year out ultimately be cut down about 25 per cent. The great cost of the retired list and of administration is so weighting down our naval appropriation each year that we approach the limit of cost the Congress is willing to bear before providing for any increase. While the change would work a hardship against the officers who have neglected their opportunities to go to sea, it would not work a hardship against those who have sought that excellence in their profession that has been possible and desirable. I do not believe it ought to be drastic, but as it stands on the face of it it works an essential decrease in Government expenditures.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, may I crave the indulgence of the Chair a moment or two on the point of order? The gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] are endeavoring to argue that on the face of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee there is a necessary reduction in the expenses of the Navy Department. Now, I want to say to the Chair, and I would like the attention of the Chair for just a moment if I may have it, that on the face of the proposed amendment there is an increase in the naval expenses necessitated by carrying out the terms of this bill. The bill as it first came to my attention provided it should take effect in the year 1913. I have been informed by the Secretary of the Navy that had that date remained in the bill and it became a law three captains and two commanders would have been placed on the retired list within the life of this bill; that is, within the next fiscal year. Now, Mr. Chairman, is not it as plain as daylight that if you force men on the retired list and do not abolish the positions which those men left and which must be automatically filled under the operation of law by other men, who will draw the same pay, allowance, and salaries, that you have increased expenses by increasing the number of men on the retired list?

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield? Does not the gentleman of course realize that if those officers had not been retired as commanders and captains they would have been soon retired as rear admirals?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. That may be and may not be. Those men might be plucked or retired or disabled or die or be killed in battle or for other reasons go out of the service.

Mr. HOBSON. If they are out of the service, they are no expense at all.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. The bill shows there must be necessarily an increase of expenditures by reason of this forced retirement of officers. If the bill provided for a vacation of the positions which are filled by the officers who are retired, then you would have brought about a reduction of expense, because the Government would only pay the retired salary of those officers instead of the full pay, but this bill does not do that. It is contemplated under its terms that officers will be retired because of the lack of necessary sea service and——

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. When you force officers on the retired list and immediately fill their places with other officers, you are increasing the naval expenses.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman seems not to have understood it.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I do understand it.

Mr. HOBSON. Those officers have to be retired in some grade.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Not necessarily; they may die in the service.

Mr. HOBSON. Then they would not be any expense. The gentleman's own idea that they may die in the service should show him that they do not increase the expense. The net result, which the gentleman himself must recognize, is that the average officer on the retired list will be at a lower rank than at a higher rank, and that must be a reduction of expense.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. It may and it may not.

Mr. HOBSON. It is bound to be.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. It is a problematical result, but the effect is to increase your expenses on the retired list. Now, as to the proposition of reducing the cost on the active list and increasing it on the retired list, I shall not endeavor to settle that question, I can not go into it. We do not know what the relative proportion will be in the present year or in any future year, but we do know that by this kind of arbitrary retirement of officers, where you have not abolished an office in which you will put another man at the same salary, that the salaries on the active list will go on at the same amount with the same number of officers of the grade after the passage of this law as before it, and the retired list being increased by the arbitrary retirement of officers, this bill shows on its face will in that respect increase the naval expenses, and the provision which compels the Secretary of the Navy to give sea service to officers requesting it necessitates an increase of expenses. The Secretary of the Navy has informed the Naval Committee that to carry out the provisions of this law would cost about $28,000,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I think I have a right to be heard, as I am a Member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. On which side?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I think it is an increase in expenditures and that the point of order ought to be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman unless he insists on discussing the point of order.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Of course, if the Chair is ready to rule that the point of order is good, then I do not think I wish to be heard; but, if the Chair is not, I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is made against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. In determining as to the sufficiency of the point of order, it is necessary to ascertain whether the provisions of the amendment come within the requirement of section 2 of Rule XXI. In the opinion of the Chair, viewing the constructions of this rule as have been given it heretofore, and in the light of the application of the rule as heretofore practiced by the committee and the House, this amendment does not come within the provisions or requirements of section 2 of Rule XXI, and the Chair is therefore constrained to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following modified amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 11, page 4, insert:

"That after January 1, 1914, no captain or commander of the line of the Navy who is not restricted by law to shore duty only shall be promoted to the next higher grade who has not performed at least two full years of sea service in cruising ships of the Navy in his grade, and any captain or commander who has not complied with the qualifications for promotion by the date of occurrence of his vacancy for promotion shall be placed on the retired list: Provided, That this qualification may be waived by the Secretary of the Navy for meritorious administrative reasons: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress at each ensuing regular session the reasons for the waiver of this qualification in each case wherever exercised."

Mr. BUTLER. I only reserve a point of order for the reason that I did not hear the Clerk read very distinctly. I——

Mr. PADGETT. Except the latter part of it, it is identically word for word with the other.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PADGETT. That is the very provision I pointed out, of increasing the Navy retired list and not reducing the pay on the Government list.

Mr. HOBSON. My contention is absolutely correct, that if you do not retire officers in the lower grades you will have to retire them as admirals. They are grinding them out by the hopperful, until we now have 146 rear admirals on the retired list. If they were retired at the lower grade it would be less expensive to the Government. It would not necessarily involve putting additional ships in commission, but it would increase the proportion at sea as compared to the proportion on land, which would be a decided reduction in cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk reads, I wish to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, after line 11, add as a new paragraph:

"Provided, That there is hereby established a council of national defense, consisting of the President of the United States, who shall be ex officio president of the council; the Secretary of State, who shall preside in the absence of the President; the Secretary of War; the Secretary of the Navy; the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate; the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate; the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate; the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate; the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives; the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives; the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives; the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives; the Chief of the General Staff of the Army; an officer of the Navy not below the rank of captain, to be designated by the Secretary of the Navy; the president of the Army War College; and the president of the Navy War College.

"And that the chairmen of the several committees of the Senate and House of Representatives herein named shall act as members of the council until their successors have been selected.

"And that said council shall report to the President for transmission to Congress a general policy of national defense and such recommendation of measures relating thereto as it shall deem necessary and expedient.

"And that said council shall meet at least once in each calendar year on such date or dates as it shall fix: Provided, That in time of war said council shall meet only upon the call of the President of the United States: Provided further, That special meetings may be called by the president of the council: And provided further, That the council may summon for consultation at any of its meetings any citizen of the United States, and upon request by the council the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall order any officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps to appear before the council for consultation."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. BARTLETT. If you will let me make it. I make the point of order on the ground that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill, contrary to all the rules of the House, and does not come within the provisions of the new so-called Holman rule.

Mr. HOBSON. I am perfectly prepared to discuss the point of order. I do not think the gentleman wants to make it and precipitate a discussion.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman hopes in vain.

Mr. HOBSON. When the gentleman knows what the bill is——

Mr. BARTLETT. I think I know what it is.

Mr. HOBSON. I mailed you a copy. It is a unanimous committee amendment. But I will speak to the point of order if the gentleman will permit. I do not believe the gentleman wants to make it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve it in deference to the wishes of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]. When he is through I will make the point of order, and that will be final.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the floor to the gentleman long enough to make the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOBSON. I would like to speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

This bill creates a council of national defense to coordinate the various arms of the Government that are involved in the national defense. I will read in a few moments from the hearings of the men who know, such men as Gen. Wotherspoon, president of the Army War College, and Admiral Mahan, another expert, and show how it would result in not a small saving but a large percentage ultimately of saving in the whole expenses of the Naval and Military Establishments.

But before taking up the authorities upon the subject I will point out that this amendment brings together in this council of national defense the executive branch of the Government and the legislative branch of the Government and experts competent to furnish them with technical information when required. Representing the executive branch of the Government, there is the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy for the technical branches; there is the Secretary of State, representing foreign relations; and the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and also at the head of the executive administration of the Government.

Now, then, that clearly will coordinate on general matters of policy, just as the General Board of the Army and Navy coordinates on technical matters. It will not only promote efficiency, but it would frequently, again and again, practically all the time, reduce expenditures by the proper coordination of the different branches. Under its workings the various branches could get together and finally decide on a common policy and reduce the expenses and prevent duplication. That occurs again and again in the coordination of the technical departments of the Army and Navy.

But this council, in addition, would bring together all the parties involved. Take the matter of our foreign policies. The Secretary of State comes in. He can acquaint us with the conditions in foreign lands upon which we might save the question of a cruise of a fleet. We might send a fleet around the world at stupendous expense when it might be unnecessary. We might be maintaining forces at a distance and at a great expense when it might not be necessary.

It is not necessary for me to point out all the great possibilities of this council. Let me impress upon the chairman the fact that there is not one single new officer or office created; that even the meetings would be held at the Army War College, where they would have the available staff and equipment there at their command. Let me point out the fact that there is not one dollar of expense entailed.

That being the condition, it only remains to point out that you could get coordination, reduction of duplication, to show that it will be a reduction of expense to the Government in the end. But without going further into that with regard to the executive branch, let me point out this fact, that it brings together the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the chairmen of the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses before we determine what is going to be recommended to Congress.

One of the great difficulties incurred by the Democratic Party has been that when we took hold of the reins of Government we had no agency that could show us what is really necessary for efficiency and coordination. It has been frequently alleged that the chairman of the Naval Committee and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs bring in recommendation here that are out of keeping with the finances of the Government. That is the very basis, for instance, for the contention that we ought not to have any battleships in this bill. Frequently it is pointed out in the Committee on Appropriations, where frequently appropriations come together, that the naval service and the military service have duplicated. Even in the Marine Corps and in the naval service you sometimes find duplication. All of that would be eliminated. We bring the economy officer of the House and the economy officer of the Senate—we bring the "watchdogs of the Treasury"—right into the fountainhead, where the policies are determined and the recommendations are made. It can not help but end in large economies to get such coordination.

Now, then, I will not detain the Chair long in reading these hearings. They are exhaustive hearings. They have been going on for two or three years. I will simply quote Gen. Wotherspoon, president of the Army War College, who appeared before our committee. He said:

I consider that this bill will coordinate the efforts of the Army and the Navy and the legislative branch into some unified policy which will make for decided economy and still more decidedly for efficiency. I have stated to this committee before and to the Military Committee that I am perfectly convinced that an army three times as efficient and probably twice as strong as we have now can be maintained for the money we are at present spending for the Army.

That means that in his judgment we could maintain the Army at a saving of many millions of dollars every year, or it means that we could have an Army of fully half again the size of the present Army without one added dollar of increased expense.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will my friend from Alabama permit a question?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he believes that it is possible to organize any body of officials in the city of Washington, even though they are already officials of the Army, of the Navy, or of the civil branch of the Government, and even though there is no proposed increase of their compensation, without increasing the general expenses?

Mr. HOBSON. In the long run they probably might buy some additional stationery. I am not sure. In the long run they might send an officer to the Philippine Islands to investigate whether Corregidor or Subic Bay could be abandoned.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We have settled that already, have we not?

Mr. HOBSON. At some time they might send an agent somewhere who would save the Government many millions of dollars, and in doing so would incur incidental expenses; but I do not believe there would be any appreciable increase in expenses except under extraordinary conditions.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would it not mean a corps of stenographers, clerks, and so forth?

Mr. HOBSON. I do not think so. This is not a board that sits and carries on regular operations. It does not sit often as a cabinet.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not the initiation of a system which will result in increased expenditures?

Mr. HOBSON. I do not think so. If the gentleman will read the report on it he will find that it corresponds to the council of imperial defense of Great Britain, the great council in Germany, and similar councils in most Governments.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to read a more detailed statement about this.

Mr. HOBSON. When the gentleman reads the report upon it, I do not think he will make any point of order against it; but if he does, I do not think it will lie.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did not the gentleman propose an outlay in the bill embodying this same idea?

Mr. HOBSON. As originally drawn and recommended by the committee it did carry $20,000 for an indefinite period, but it did not mean that one dollar of that would necessarily be expended in inaugurating the council.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What does the gentleman mean by "an indefinite period"?

Mr. HOBSON. That if there should arise a condition where it would save the Government money as well as add to the efficiency of the service they might have that appropriation for the purpose of sending messengers, or for some special undertaking which would require a small expenditure, and would have the money on hand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman can establish the fact that it will increase the probability of a successful defense of the country if it is ever assaulted, and that it will not make for expense out of proportion to the benefits, I tell him frankly that I will support it, as I will support every measure of that kind.

Mr. HOBSON. I believe the gentleman will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But I am unconvinced at this time.

Mr. HOBSON. When we come to debate the merits of the question I will show the gentleman how it will not only promote efficiency, but may actually determine the way in which future wars may end. In the war between Russia and Japan and in the war between England and the Boers it was found that just the lack of that coordination which such a council would bring about caused them to suffer great reverses. Further, the existence of a council like this in Germany has been the foundation and basis of the success of their arms. But I will not discuss that question now.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman if the general staff in Germany has not been alleged to be the author of their great military projects?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes; and if the gentleman has studied that question, as I am sure he has, he will recognize that that general staff is in close touch with the council which has the Emperor at the head of it, and the foreign minister, the cabinet officer representing the army, and the cabinet officer representing the navy; and it is that council which has brought about that efficiency.

I ask the Chair to rule on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I have the greatest respect, admiration, and affection for the Chairman, and I will not appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the act approved May 13, 1908, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, in so far as it relates to the payment of six months' pay to the widow of an officer or enlisted man, etc., be amended to read as follows:

"That hereafter immediately upon official notification of the death, from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct, of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Navy and Marine Corps the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and, if no widow, to the children, and, if there be no children, to any other dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death, less $75 in the case of an officer and $35 in the case of an enlisted man, to defray expenses of interment, and the residue, if any, of the amount reserved shall be paid subsequently to the designated person."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I wish to ascertain, if he can tell, what is meant by the words "designated person" at the end of this paragraph?

Mr. PADGETT. Under existing law any dependent relative of an officer or enlisted man, previously designated by him, is entitled to six months' pay upon his death, if it is due to any accident or cause incurred in the line of duty. He can designate any person to receive it. In the event he does not designate anyone it goes to the widow, but he can designate a person and take it away from his wife and children. We intend to eliminate that and require him to designate the widow or the children or a dependent relative.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the commander in chief of the United States Atlantic Fleet and the commander in chief of the United States Pacific Fleet, respectively, shall each, after being designated as such commander in chief by the President, and from the date of assuming command of such fleet until his relinquishment of such command, have the rank and pay of an admiral; and in each of the above-named fleets the officer serving as second in command thereof shall each, after being designated as such second in command by the President, and from the date of assuming duty as such second in command until his relinquishment of such duty, have the rank and pay of a vice admiral; and the grades of admiral and vice admiral in the Navy are hereby reestablished and authorized for the purposes of this section. The annual pay of an admiral shall be $12,000 and of a vice admiral $10,000: Provided, That in time of peace officers to serve as commander in chief and as second in command of the two said fleets shall be designated from among the rear admirals on the active list of the Navy: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall create any vacancy in any grade in the Navy, nor increase the total number of officers allowed by existing law, and that when an officer is detached from duty as such commander in chief or as such second in command, as above provided, he shall return to his regular rank in the list of rear admirals, and shall thereafter receive only the pay and allowances of such regular rank.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph as a change in existing law.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman reserve it for a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. PADGETT. I will state frankly that it is subject to a point of order, and it can only be considered by unanimous consent of the House. If anybody raises a point of order, it is well taken. I want to say to the gentleman that these grades are needed very badly in the Navy. Our Navy has now grown to such size and importance that in the management of it, in its domestic relations and efficient operation, and especially in its international relations and associations, we need the two grades. You will notice this last designation, the necessity to take them from the rear admirals. It does not add to the force at all, but it simply allows the President to designate a commander in chief and a second in command on the Atlantic and the Pacific, and they have the rank and pay of admiral and vice admiral. On account of the importance of the matter I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to add a word, if the gentleman will yield, on the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. I will give you gentlemen an illustration. Our Navy goes abroad and comes in contact and in association with the navy of Japan or China or of any of the South American countries. I believe there are 26 countries that have a grade of vice admiral and perhaps 15 or 16 that have the grade of admiral. Many of them have no navy to amount to anything, but when our Navy or the naval officers come in contact with them our naval officers have to take a rear position, and our Navy has to be assigned to the rear guard and allow the navies of these foreign countries that may have a gunboat and a vice admiral to take precedence over ours. At the table and all social functions and gatherings our Navy is relegated to the rear, while the little ones are placed in the front; also in all international cooperative naval work.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to begin my question by saying that where McGregor sits is the head of the table. What rank in the Army corresponds to an admiral in the Navy?

Mr. HOBSON. Lieutenant general.

Mr. PADGETT. That is a vice admiral.

Mr. SLAYDEN. A captain corresponds to a colonel; a rear admiral, junior grade, corresponds to the rank of a brigadier general. Now, what is the next rank?

Mr. PADGETT. An admiral corresponds to a general.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The rank that you propose of admiral must correspond to a lieutenant general or a general.

Now, the grade of lieutenant general was abolished by the Sixty-first Congress. It has been abolished by law. Now, why should a similar rank be created in the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. The reason I give is that the Army has no international contact or international association; it does not come in contact with the armies of other countries, but the Navy is continually and constantly doing so.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. What is the comparative salary of an admiral in other navies as compared with the same position in our own Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. Much higher.

Mr. GARNER. In the small navy?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know; I am speaking of the principal powers.

Mr. GARNER. I am speaking of the small powers which the gentleman says take precedence of ours. What is their salary as compared with an American officer of the same grade?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know what it is; but, independent of the question of salary, our officers and our Navy would have to be relegated to the rear.

Mr. GARNER. Does not the gentleman suppose that our officers would prefer to be relegated to the rear at a high salary rather than to have a lower salary and a higher position?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I have been informed by naval officers that so far as the little increase provided for in this matter is concerned it does not count. A rear admiral of first nine now gets $8,000, and we provide $10,000 for the vice admiral and $12,000 for the Admiral. Just for two of them on each ocean, or four in all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And a 50 per cent increase for the other. That is a trifle.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to say that, so far as the salaries are concerned, I am willing to strike that out and just give the rank and grade to the Navy, and leave the salary as it is now on the list.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that would only be a preliminary step to the granting of the additional salary, and it ought to be, for if you confer the rank you ought to give the corresponding compensation.

Mr. PADGETT. I am frank to say that I think there ought to be a corresponding salary, but in order to relieve the Navy of embarrassment in every international association, in every international meeting in which our Navy comes in contact with the navies of other countries, where we are relegated to the rear and embarrassed by that condition, the naval officers are willing to forego the question of salary for the rank.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me a suggestion there before he insists upon his point of order?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am not the man who is making the point of order, but I shall make it if necessary.

Mr. PADGETT. Having said what I did, if the gentleman is going to make the point of order I wish he would make it now.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that really, in my mind, it is not the question of social precedence or prestige at functions. It is a question of having a superior command and an inferior command. Take the two squadrons of our fleet, eight vessels each on the line. The commander in chief of that fleet ought not to be of the same rank as the commanding officers of the two squadrons under him. We have now the anomalous position of one rear admiral commanding numbers of other rear admirals. The gentleman is fully posted upon the military necessity of having a commander in chief of a grade higher than any officer in his command in the field.

The gentleman recognizes whenever that position occurs or has occurred in the past in the field, whether in the Army or in the Navy, Congress invariably has created the higher rank, so that the same rank might not be commanding themselves. And it happens now in the organization of the American Navy, and it will be a permanent condition—for it is not as it is in the Army, which seldom comes together with two or three corps, requiring a general and various lieutenant generals—I doubt whether we will ever have such a condition except in time of war—but in the Navy in the operations every day we must have this commander in chief, and we will have to have these commanders of squadrons and commanders of divisions all as rear admirals. You notice that you would have this condition: Two rear admirals in each division in command of four ships each, and over those two rear admirals you will have another rear admiral in command of that squadron, and over the two rear admirals in command of the squadrons you will have still another rear admiral in command of the fleet. It is an anomalous condition that can not permanently be maintained with efficiency.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is no difficulty, I fancy, in having the senior officer of the grade command the others. That occurs all of the time in military service. If this is done at the very first opportunity some gentleman will rise and say that we must increase the pay of certain officers of the Army because, forsooth, Congress, having harkened to the persuasive and eloquent appeal of my friend from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], has increased the rank and pay of officers in the Navy. I have heard that absurd argument advanced here for 15 years, that you must equalize the pay of the officers of the Army with those of the Navy, and then, if they grant a little further advance, as when they undertake to equalize it, as they seem always to do, there comes an appeal from the officers of the Navy to equalize their pay with the corresponding grade in the Army.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman has not lost sight of the fact that this does not create a permanent grade.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is made, and I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, to follow line 7 as an additional paragraph, insert the following:

"That the portion of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes,' approved June 24, 1910, which reads as follows:

"'The pay and allowances of chiefs of bureaus of the Navy Department shall be the highest shore-duty pay and allowances of the rear admiral of the lower nine, and all officers of the Navy who are now serving or who shall hereafter serve as chief of bureau in the Navy Department, and are eligible for retirement after 30 years' service, shall have, while on the active list, the rank, title, and emoluments of a chief of bureau, in the same manner as is already provided by statute law for such officers upon retirement by reason of age or length of service, and such officers, after 30 years' service, shall be entitled to and shall receive new commissions in accordance with the rank and title hereby conferred' be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That no officer who has ceased to hold the office of chief of any bureau, and who is entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the act of June 24, 1910, shall be denied or deprived thereof by virtue of this repeal.

"SEC. 2. That section 1473 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 1473. Officers who have been or who shall be retired from the position of Chiefs of Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, Supplies and Accounts, Yards and Docks, or of Construction and Repair, or who, after having served four years as chief of bureau, shall be retired at any time after having ceased to hold such position, by reason of age or length of service or disability incident to the service, shall have the rank of rear admiral.'

"SEC. 3. That hereafter officers of staff corps of the Navy below the rank of rear admiral shall be promoted in rank with the officer of the line with whom or next after whom they take precedence on the list of order of precedence of the Navy, and to carry out this provision temporary changes shall be made, when necessary, in the numbers of the various grades and ranks established by law for the staff corps: Provided, That there shall be no permanent increase in any grade or rank whose number is now fixed by law and no increase in the total number of officers now fixed by law for any staff corps."

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment as offered is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the first paragraph of the bill down to and including the words "are hereby repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the portion of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes," approved June 24, 1910, which reads as follows:

"The pay and allowances of chiefs of bureaus of the Navy Department shall be the highest shore-duty pay and allowances of the rear admiral of the lower nine, and all officers of the Navy who are now serving or who shall hereafter serve as chief of bureau in the Navy Department, and are eligible for retirement after 30 years' service, shall have, while on the active list, the rank, title, and emoluments of a chief of bureau, in the same manner as is already provided by statute law for such officers upon retirement by reason of age or length of service, and such officers, after 30 years' service, shall be entitled to and shall receive new commissions in accordance with the rank and title hereby conferred," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the amendment for the purpose of giving the chairman of the committee an opportunity to tell the committee wherein his amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, under existing law a chief of bureau while holding office has the rank, pay, and title of rear admiral.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And allowances.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; and allowances. The section which we propose to repeal, which was enacted in 1910, provides that after going out of the office of chief of bureau he shall, while on the active list, continue to have the rank, pay, allowance, and grade of a rear admiral, and after 30 years shall have the right to retire with that rank. Now, this repeals that provision, so that when he ceases to be a chief of bureau he returns to the rank and pay which he had when he was first appointed, or if a commander is appointed chief of bureau and retires, he resumes his rank in the line.

Mr. SLAYDEN. For the purpose of retirement.

Mr. PADGETT. Of course, he can pass on up afterwards.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is when he is relieved from that bureau.

Mr. PADGETT. When he retires from the office, not from the service, he would resume his original rank.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That, of course, is an economy.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; an economy, and it is clearly within the rule.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As I understand——

Mr. BURLESON. This corrects what has been denominated as the "admiral factory."

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. The effect of the repeal of this law is to reduce the number of rear admirals on the active list?

Mr. PADGETT. And also to prevent them from being created by appointment. Under the law as it is now, as I termed it once before, it is an admiral factory. A man is appointed chief of bureau, and he can serve three months and then be removed and go upon the active list as a rear admiral all the rest of his life.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. And under this amendment he can only act as a rear admiral——

Mr. PADGETT. While actively serving as chief of bureau.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. And when he retires he goes back to his regular rank.

Mr. BURLESON. The provision was really enacted to take care of two men.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not insist upon the point of order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to expedite matters, and I want to say that there is a very great demand for a dental-surgeon corps in the Navy. There is none, and there should be one. We have an amendment here providing for the establishment of a dental corps in the Navy identical with the one that is in the Army, and I want to ask unanimous consent to present it. If anybody objects, I will say it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It was acted upon by the committee favorably?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; it is a committee amendment, and it is recommended by the department, and it is identical with the one now existing in the Army. It is a unanimous report from the committee.

We have 44,000 men in the Navy now, not including the officers, not including the Marine Corps, but about 60,000 when you include them. And we have authorized in this bill 4,000 more enlisted men.

Mr. TILSON. What is done at present? Do you have contract dentists?

Mr. PADGETT. They sort of make it up, and they get hospital stewards and that sort to study dentistry and practice on the men as best they can. The service is suffering as a result of it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How many dental surgeons do you propose to appoint under this?

Mr. PADGETT. I believe it is 30. It puts it on the same basis as the Army, which provides for appointing dental surgeons and then for the employment of dental contract surgeons in the same proportion that they are employed in the Army—one to every thousand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In precisely the same ratio as in the Army?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; one to a thousand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Where do you propose to station them?

Mr. PADGETT. Most of them will be on the ships with the men.

Mr. SLAYDEN. When my friend from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] gets all the ships he wants, I am afraid that proportion will be disturbed.

Mr. PADGETT. This fixes it one to a thousand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What sort of rank or pay do you propose to give them? Are they given the same as commissioned officers?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the several enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps then attached to the United States ship Georgia the respective sums of money placed by said enlisted men on deposit for safe-keeping with the pay officer of said ship as permitted by article 1331 of the Navy Regulations, which said sums were stolen on February 10 or 11, 1911, by one Edward V. Lee, clerk of said pay officer; and the sum of $4,300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the money which this man Lee stole was money which was deposited with him for safekeeping by the men on board ship. It is a question whether the United States Government should hold itself responsible for the refunding of this money which these men voluntarily deposited with the clerk of the ship, and whether the Congress can properly enact a law now to reimburse them for the loss of their money by their own voluntary act.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption for just a moment?
